this new gentleman, of whom I heard yesterday for the first time. He will only hurt himself, and do no good to his party, for in party the whole thing originate. Our modes of thinking and writing are so materially different, that I can conceive no greater ambition than attempting to make any approach between the English and Italian poetry of the precent day. I like the people very much, and their literature very much, but I am not the least ambistious of being the subject of their discussions literary and personal, (which appear to be pretty much

1 On the birth of this child, who was christened John William Rossi, Lorden Rossini wrote the following lines, which are in no other respect remarkable than that they were thought worthy of being translated into so much less different languages: namely, Greek, Latin, Italian (also in the Venetian dialect), German, French, Spanish, Italian, Hebrew Armenian, and Samaritan:

"His father's name, his mother's grace
In him, I hope, will always be so:
With (still to keep him in good case)
The health and happiness of Rossini."

2 The original lines, with the different versions above mentioned, were published in a small volume, in the Seminary of Pisa. —Mrs. W.
BYRON'S WORKS.

"I have not, as you say, 'taken to wife the Adriatic.' I heard of Moore's loss of himself in a letter which was delayed upon the road three months; and was sincerely sorry for it, but in such cases what are words? The villa you speak of is one at Este, which Mr. Hopper (consul-general here), has transferred to me. I have taken it for two years as a place of villeggiatura. The situation is very beautiful indeed, among the Euganean hills, and the house very fair. The vines are luxuriant to a great degree, and all the fruits of the earth abundant. It is close to the old castle of the Este, or Guephus, and within a few miles of Arqua, which I have visited twice, and hope to visit often.

'Last summer (except an excursion to Rome), I passed upon the Brenta. In Venice I winter, transporting my horses with the Lido, bordering the Adriatic, (where the fort is,) so that I get a gallop of some miles daily along the strip of beach which reaches to Malamocco, when in health; but within these few weeks I have been unwell. At present I am getting better. The Carnival was short but a good one. I don't go out much, except during the time of masks; but there are one or two conversations, where I go regularly, just to keep up the system, as I had letters to their givers; and they are particular on such points; and now and then, though very rarely, to the Governor's.

'It is a very good place for women. I like the dialect and their manner very much. There is a sontevel about them which is very winning, and the romance of the place is a mighty adjunct; the bel sapphire is not, however, now among the dame or higher orders; but all under il fazzuoli, or kerciefs, (a white kind of veil which the lower orders wear upon their heads)—the resta zendaole, or old national female costume, is no more. The city, however, is decaying daily, and does not gain in population. However, I prefer it to any other in Italy, and here have I pitched my staff, and here do I purpose to reside for the remainder of my life, unless events, connected with business not to be transacted out of England compel me to return for that purpose; otherwise I have few regrets, and no desires to visit it again for its own sake. I shall probably be obliged to do so, to sign papers for my affairs and a proxy for the Whigs, and to see Mr. Waite, for I can't find a good dentist here, and every two or three years one ought to consult one.—About seeing my children, I must take my chance. One I shall have sent here; and I shall be very happy to see the legitimate son when God pleases, which he perhaps will some day or other. As for my mathematical wife, I am as well without her.

'Your account of your visit to Fonthill is very striking. Could you beg of him for me a copy in MS. of the remaining Tales? I think you deserve them, as a strenuous and public admirer of the first one. I will return it when read, and make no ill use of the copy, if granted. Murray would send me out any thing safely. If ever I return to England, I should like very much to see the author, with his permission. In the mean time, you could not oblige me more than by obtaining me the personal I request, in French or English, only one for that, though I prefer Italian to either. I have a French copy of Vathey, which I bought at Lausanne. I can read French with great pleasure and facility, though I neither speak nor write it. Now Italian I can speak with some fluency, and write sufficiently for my purposes, but I don't like their modern prose at all; it is very heavy, and so different from Machiavelli."

"They say Francis is Junius;—I think it looks like it. I remember meeting him at Earl Grey's at dinner. Has not he lately married a young woman; and was not he Madame Talleyrand's cavalier ser- enede in India years ago?"

'Ve read my death in the papers, which was not true. I see they are marrying the remaining singleness of the royal family. They have brought out Fario with great and deserved success at Covent Garden; that's a good sign. I tried, during the directory, to have it put at Drury Lane, but was overruled. If you think of coming into this country, you will let me know beforehand. I suppose Moore will not move. But if he does, I saw him the other night at Madame Albrizzi's; he talked of returning in May. My love to the Hollands."

"My Dear Tom,

'Since my last, which hope that you have received, I have had a letter from our friend Samuel. He talks of Italy this summer—won't you come with him? I don't know whether you would like our Italian way of life or not.

'Ve read a tale to the other day. The day I was telling a girl, 'you must not come to-morrow, because Margaret is going at such a time;'—they were both about five feet ten inches high, with great black eyes and fine features—fit to breed gladiators from—and had some difficulty to prevent a battle upon a rencontre once before)—unless you promise to be friends, and.—the answer was an interruption by a declaration of war against the other, which she said would be a 'Guerra di Canda.' Is it not odd, that the lower order of Venetians should still allude provocably to such a contest, so glorious and so fatal to the Republic?

'They have singular expressions, like all the Italians. For example, 'Visere'—as we would say, 'my love,' or 'my heart,' as an expression of tenderness. Also, 'I would go for you in the midst of a hundred knives.'—'Mazza ben,' excessive at tachment,—literally, 'I wish you well even to kill you.' Then they say, (except in our way,) 'I think I would do you so much harm?')—'do you think I would assassinate you in such a manner?'

'Tempo perfide,' bad weather; 'Strade perfide,' and road, with a thousand other allusions and metaphors, taken from the state of society and habits in the middle ages.

'Among I am not so sure about mazzos, whether it don't

She was my greatest friend, of the feminine gender:—when I say 'friend,' I mean not mistress, for that's the antipodes. Tell me all about you and every body—how Sam is—how you like your neighbors, the Marquis and Marchesa, &c., &c."

"Venice, March 25, 1819.

I have your letter, with the account of 'Beppo,' for which I sent you four new stanzas a fortnight ago, in case you print or reprint.* * * *

"Croker's is a good guess; but the style is not English—it is Italian—Berni is the original of all. Whistlercraft was my immediate model; Rose's 'Animal!' I never saw till a few days ago,—they are excellent. But (as I said above), Berni is the father of that kind of writing, which I think suits our language, too, very well;—we shall see by the experiment. If it does, I shall send you a volume in a year or two, for I know the Italian way of life well, and in time may know it yet better; and as for the verse and the passions, I have them still in tolerable vigor.

"If you think that it will do you and the work, or works, any good, you may put my name to it; but first consult the knowing ones. It will, at any rate, show them that I can write cheerfully, and repel the charge of monopoly and mannerism.

LETTER CCCLXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, April 12, 1819.

"This letter will be delivered by Signor Gioe Bata. Missilaglia, proprietor of the Apollo library and the principal publisher and bookseller now in Venice. He sets out for London with a view to business and correspondence with the English booksellers: and it is in the hope that it may be for your mutual advantage that I furnish him with this letter of introduction to you. If you can be of use to him, either by recommendation to others, or by any personal attention on your own part, you will oblige him, and gratify me. You may also perhaps both be enabled, or derive advantage, or establish some mode of literary communication, pleasing to the public, and beneficial to one another.

"At any rate, be civil to him for my sake, as well as for the honor and glory of publishers and authors above all and to your own; and: I am sure, to the letters of Lord Hervey, Lady M. W. Montague, (hers are but few—some billets-doux in French to Algarotti, and one letter in English, Italian, and all sorts of jargon, to the same,) Gray the poet, (one letter,) Mason, (two or three,) Garrick, Lord Chatham, David Hume, and many of less note,—all addressed to Count Algarotti. Out of these, I think, with discretion, an amusing miscellaneous volume of letters might be extracted, provided some good editor were disposed to undertake the selection, and preface, and a few notes, &c.

"The propietor of these is a friend of mine, Dr. Aymetti,—a great name in Italy, and if you are disposed to publish it will be for his benefit, and it is to and for him that you will name a price, and if you take upon you the work. I would edit it myself, but am too far off, and too lazy to undertake it; but I wish that it could be done. The letters of Lord Hervey, in Mr. Rose's opinion and mine, are good; and the short French love-letters certainly are Lady M. W. Montague's,—the French not good, but the sentiments beautiful. This took good, and Mason's tolerable. The whole correspondence must be well needed; but this being done, a small and pretty popular volume might be made of it. There are many ministers' letters—Gray the ambassador at Naples, Horace Mann, and others of the same kind of animal.

"I thought of a preface, defending Lord Hervey against Pope's attack, but Pope—good Pope, the poet—against the world, in the unjustifiable attempts begun by Warton, and carried on at this day by the new school of critics and scrubbars, who think themselves poets because they do not write like Pope. I have no patience with such cursed humbug and bad taste; and our whole generation are not worth a canto of the Rape of the Lock, or the Essay on Man, or the Dunciad, or... any thing that is his. But it is three in the matin, and I must go to bed:

"Yours always, &c."
LETTER CCLXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, April 17, 1818.

"A few days ago, I wrote to you a letter requesting you to desire Hanson to desire his messenger to come on from Geneva to Venice, because I go not from Venice to Geneva; and if this is not done, the messenger may be damned, with him who mis-sent him to my request.

"With the proofs returned, I sent two additional stanzas for canto fourth: did they arrive?

"Your monthly reviewer has made a mistake. "Cavalieri done is well enough; "Cavalier servente" has always the same in conversation, and omitted in writing; so that it is not for the sake of metric, and pray let Griffith know this, with my compliments. I humbly conjecture that I know as much of Italian society and language as any of his people; but to make assurance doubly sure, I asked, at the Countess Benzoa's, last night, the question of more than one person in the office; and of these "cavalier servente" (in the plural, which calld not to my request), I found that they all acceded in pronouncing for "cavalier servente" in the singular number. I wish Mr. (or whoever Griffith's scribbler may be) would not talk of what he don't understand, which follows, and not fit to be intrusted with Italian, even in a quotation."

"Did you receive two additional stanzas, to be inserted towards the close of canto fourth? Respond, that (if not) they may be sent.

"Tell Mr.  and Mr. Hanson, that they may as well expect Geneva to come to me, as that I should go to Geneva. The messenger may go or return, as he pleases; I won't stir: and I look upon it as a piece of singular absurdity in those who know me, imagining that I should—not to say malice, in attempting unnecessary torture. If, on the occasion, my interests should suffer, it is their neglect that is to blame; and they may all be d—d together.

"It is ten o'clock, and time to dress.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCLXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"April 23, 1818.

"The time is past in which I could feel for the dead—or I should feel for the death of Lady Melbourne, the best, and kindest, and ablest female I ever knew, old or young. But I have supped full of horrors, and events of this kind have only a kind of numbness worse than pain, like a violent blow on the elbow or the head. There is one link between England and myself—my poetry.

"Now to business. I presented you with Beppo, as part of the contract for canto fourth, considering the price you are to pay for the same, and intending to see you out in case of public caprice or my own poetical failure. If you choose to suppress it entirely, at Mr. (or) suggestion, you may do as you please. But recollect it is not to be published in a garbled or mutilated state. I reserve to my friends and myself the right of correcting the press: if the publication continues, it is to continue in its present form.

"As Mr.  says that he did not write this letter, &c., I am ready to believe him; but for the firmness of my former persuasion, I refer to Mr.  I can inform you now fully on this point. He has also the note—or, at least, bad it, for I gave it to him with my verbal comments thereupon. As to 'Beppo,' I will not alter or suppress a syllable for any man's pleasure but my own.

"You may tell them this; and add, that nothing but force or necessity shall stir me one step towards the places to which they would wring me.

"If your literary matters prosper, let me know

If 'Beppo' is published, you shall have more in a year or two in the same mood. And so, 'Good morrow to you, good Master Lieutenant.'

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCLXXIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Palermo, Messina, Cora Grande. "Venice, June 1, 1818.

"Your letter is almost the only news, as yet, of canto fourth, and it has by no means settled its fate,—at least, does not tell me how the 'poesie' has been received by the public. But I suspect, no great things,—firstly, from Murray's 'horrid stillness;' secondly: from what you say about the stanzas running into each other, which calls not to my request, but a notion you have binned with among the Blues. The fact is, that the terza rima of the Italians, which always runs on and in, may have led me into experiments, and carelessness is to cause me no concern—unnecessary—in either of which events failure will be probable, and my fair-woman, 'superne,' end in a fish; so that Childe Harold will be like the mermaid, my family crest, with the fourth canto to a tall tale thereunto. We won't quarrel with the public, however, for the 'Bulgars' are generally right; and if I miss now, I may hit another time: and so 'the gods give us joy.'

"You like Beppo; that's right.

"I have not had the Fudges yet, but live in hopes. I need not say that your successes are mine. By-the-way, Lydia White is here, and has just borrowed my copy of 'Lalla Rookh.'

"'Hunt's letter is probably the exact piece of vulgar coxcombry you might expect from his situation. He is a good man, with some poetical elements in his character, but spoiled by the Christian Church Hospital and a Sunday newspaper,—to say nothing of the Sury jail, which conceived him into a martyr. But he is a good man. When I read 'Rimini' in MSS., I thought that I deemed it good poetry at bottom, disfigured only by a strange style. His answer was, that his style was a system, or upon system, or some such cant; and, when a man talks of system, his case is hopeless, so I said no more to him, and very little to any one else.

"He believes his trash of vulgar phrases tortured into compound barbarisms to be old English; and we may say of it as Aimwell says of Captain Hþbit's regiment, when the captain calls it an 'old corps,'—the oldest in Europe, if I may judge by your uniform. He sent out his 'Pollage' by Percy Shelley, and, of all the inefable cantards that were (or are) ever forgotten, the man at night-smere, I think this monstrous sagittary the most prodigious. He (Leigh H.) is an honest charlatan, who has persuaded himself into a belief of his own impostures, and talks Funch in pure simplicity of heart, taking himself (as Mr. Fitzgerald said of himself in the Morning Post) for Vates in both senses, or non-senses, of the word. Did you look at the translations at his own which he prefers to Pope and Dryden, and says so?—Did you read his skilable skambol about  being at the head of his own profession in the eyes of those who follow it? I thought that poetry was an art, or an attribute, and not a profession—but be it one, to that ** **

*Mr. Moore had said, in his letter to him, that this passage of carrying one stanza into another, was 'something like taking an engine another stag without horse.'" at the head of your profession in your eyes? I’ll be cursed if he is of mine, or ever shall be. He is the only one of us (but of us he is not) whose coronation I would oppose. Let them take Scott, Cambell, Crabbe, or you or me, or any of the liv-ple, and a great coxcomb, and a very person in everything about him. But that’s not his fault, but of circumstances."

"I do not know any good model for a life of Sheridan but that of Savage. Recollect, however, that the life of such a man may be made far more amusing than if he had been a Wilberforce,— this without offending the living or insulting the dead. The Whigs abuse him; however, he never left them, and such blunderers deserve neither credit nor compassion. As for his creditors,—remember, Sheridan never had a shilling, and was thrown, with great powers and passions, into the thick of the world, and placed upon the pinnacle of success, with no other external means to support him in his elevation. Did Fox — pay his debts—or did Sheridan take a subscription? Was the oake of Norfolk’s drunkenness more excusable than his? Were his intrigues more notorious than those of all his contemporaries? and is his memory to be blusted, and their respected? Don’t let yourself be led away by clamor, but compare him with the coattail Fox, and the pensioner Burke, as a mad of principle, and with ten hundred thousand in personal views, and with none in talent for he beat them all out and out. Without means, without connexion, without character (which might be false at first, and made him mad afterward from desperation), he beat them all, in all he ever at-tempered. But alas, poor human nature! Good night—or, rather, morning. It is four, and the dawn gleams over the Grand Canal, and unshadows the Rialto. I must bed; up all night—but, as George Philpot says, ‘it’s life, though, damme, it’s life!’ “Ever yours,

or the door if they chose; it. She went before the commissary, but was obliged to return with that. "becco etico," as she called the possible, who had a few days a ran away again.

After a precious piece of work, she fixed herself in my house, really and truly without my consent; but, owing to my indifference, and not being able to keep her silence—after if I began in a rage, she always finished by making me laugh with some Venetian pantalooney or another; and the gipsy knew this well enough, as well as her other powers of delusion. In this the usual tangle and success of all she-things—high and low, they are all alike for that.

"Madame Benzonzi also took her under her protection, and then her head turned one was taken by a in extremes, either crying or laughing, and so fierce when angered, that she was the terror of men, women, and children—for she had the strength of an Amazon, with the temper of Medea. She was a fine animal, but quite untameable. I was the only person that could at all keep her in any order, and when she saw me really angry (which they tell me is a savage sight), she subsided. But she had a thousand petty ways. In her turn on the dress of the lower orders, she looked beautiful; but, also! she longed for a hat and feathers; and all I could do or do (and I said much) could not prevent this travesty. I put the first into the fire; but I got tired of this operation. She was in the habit of bringing them to me, so that she made herself a figure—for they did not at all become her.

"Then she would have her gown and a tail—like a lady, for both; nothing would serve her but "l’abità colla coua," or cua (that is the Venetian for "la cola," the tail or train), and as her cursed pronunciation of the word made me laugh, there was an end of all controversy, and she dragged this dignity after her every where.

"In the mean time, she beat the women and stepped my letters. I found her one day pondering over one. She used to try to find out by their shape whether they were feminine or no; and she used to lament her ignorance, and actually studied her alphabet, on purpose (as she declared) to open all letters addressed to me, and read their contents.

"I must not omit to do justice to her housekeeping qualities. After she came into my house as donna di governo," the expenses were reduced to less than half, and every body did their duty better—the apartments were kept in order, and every thing and every one, and else, expensive.

"That she had a sufficient regard for me in her wild way, I had many reasons to believe. I will mention one. In the autumn, one day going to the Lido with my gondoliers, we were overtaken by a heavy squall, and the gondola put in peril—hats blown away, boat filling, oar lost, tumbling sea, thunder, rain in torrents, night coming, and wind increasing. On our return, after a tight struggle, I found her on the open steps of the Mocenigo palace, on the Grand Canal, with her great black eyes flashing through her tears, and the long dark hair, which was streaming, drenched with rain, over her bare breasts. She was alighting from a carriage, or the sibyl of the tempest that was rolling around her, the only living thing within half at that moment except ourselves. On seeing me, she "saw me," as the gipsies say, as might have been expected, but calling out me—"And can della Madonna, xe esto il tempo por andar' al Lido?" (Ah! dog of the Virgin, is this a time to go to Lido?) ran into the house, and solaced herself with saying the boatmen for not foreseeing the 'temporal.' I am told by the servants that she had only been prevented from coming in a boat to look after me by the refusal of all the gondoliers of the canal to put out into the harbor in such a moment; and that then she sat down on the steps in all the austerity of her indolence, and would not be removed nor comforted. Her joy at seeing me again was moderately mixed with ferocity, and gave me the idea of a tigress over her recovered cubs.

"But ."er reign drew near a close. She became quite unguerurable some months after, and a concurrence of complaints, some true, and many false—"a favorite has no friends"—determined me to part with her. I told her quietly that she must return home, that she had acquired a sufficient provision for herself and mother, &c., in my service,) and she refused to quit the house. I was firm, and she went threatening knives and revenge. I told her I knew she was always five and that if she chose to begin, there was a knife and fork also, at her service on the table, and that intimidation would not do. The next day, while I was at dinner, she walked in, (having broken open a glass door that lead from the hall below to the staircase, by way of prologue,) and advancing straight up to the table, snatched the knife from my hand, cutting me slightly in the thumb in the passage,) and the furious woman, without style or manner, said to herself and me, I know not—probably against neither—but Fletcher seized her by the arms, and disarmed her. I then called my boatmen, and desired them to get the gondola ready, and conduct her to her own house, seeing carefully that she did herself no mischief by the way. She seemed quite quiet, and walked down stairs. I resumed my dinner.

"We heard a great noise, and went out, and met them on the staircase, carrying her up stairs. She had thrown herself into the canal. That she in tended to destroy herself, I do not believe: but when we consider the fear women and men who can’t avoid either a deep or even of shallow water, (and the Venetians in particular, though they live on the waves,) and that it was also night, and dark, and very cold, it shows that she had a devilish spirit of some sort within her. They had got her out without much difficulty or damage, excepting the salt water she had swallowed, and the wetting she had undergone.

"I formed her intention to relieve herself, and sent for a surgeon, inquiring how many hours it would require to restore her from her agitation; and he named the time. I ther said, 'I give you that time, and more if you require it; but at the expiration of the period, if she does not leave the house, I will.'

"All my people were consternated. They had always been frightened at her, and were now paralyzed: they wanted she to appear to the house, to guard myself, &c., &c., like a pack of anivelling servile bobby's, as they were. I did nothing of the kind, thinking that I might as well end that way as another; besides, I had been used to savage women, and knew their ways.

"I had her sent home quietly after her recovery, and never saw her since, except twice at the opera, at a distance among the audience. She made many attempts to return, but no more violent ones. And this is the story of Margarita Cogni, as far as it relates to me.

"I forgot to mention that she was very devout, and would cross herself if she heard the prayer time strike.

"She was quick in reply; as, for instance—One day when she had made me very angry with beating somebody or other, she called a coup (a concurrence in Italian, is a sad affront.) I called her 'Vecca.' She turned round, curtissed, and answered, 'Vecca tua, oelenza,' (i. e. eccellenza.) 'Your cow, please your Excellency.' The next time she was there, she wore, a very fine animal, of considerable beauty and energy, with many good and several amusing qualities, but wild as a witch and fierce as a demon. She used to boast publicly of her ascendancy over me, contrasting it with that of other women, and assigning for it sundry reasons, * * *. True it was, that they all tried to get her away, and no one succeeded till her own absurdity helped them.

“I omitted to tell you her answer, when I reproached her for snatching Madame Contarini's mask at the Cavalcina. I represented to her that she was a lady of high birth, "una Dama," &c. She answered, 'Se elle è dama mi (io) son Venezian;"—'if she is a lady, I am a Venetian.' This would have been fine a hundred years ago: the pride of the nation rising up against the pride of aristocracy: * * * but alas! Venice, and her people, and her nobles, are alike returning fast to the ocean; and where there is no independence, there can be no real self-respect. I believe that I mistook or mistated one of her phrases in my letter; it should have been—'Can' della Madonna, cosa vu's tu? esto non è tempo per andar' a Lido.'

LETTER CCCLXXVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

* Venice, June 19, 1818.

"Business, and the utter and inexplicable silence of all my correspondents, renders me impatient and troublesome. I wrote to Mr. Hanson for a balance which (or ought to be) in his hands:—no answer. I expected the messenger with the Newstead papers two months ago, and instead of him, I received a requisition to proceed to Geneva, which (from * * * who knows my wishes and opinions about approaching England) could only be irony or insult.

"I must, therefore, trouble you to pay into my bankers immediately whatever sum or sums you can make it convenient to do on our agreement; otherwise, I shall be put to the severest and most immediate inconvenience; and this at a time when, by every rational prospect and calculation, I ought to be in the receipt of considerable sums. Pray do not neglect this; you have no idea to what inconvenience you will otherwise put me. * * * had some ardent notion about the disposal of this money in annuity, (or some other) venture, which what, and I merely listened to when he was here to avoid squabbles and sermons; but I have occasion for the principal, and had never any serious idea of approbating it otherwise: I should therefore, answer my personal expenses. Hobhouse's wish is, if possible, to forward my return to England: he will not succeed; and if he did, I would not stay. I hate the country, and like this; and all foolish opposition, of course, merely adds to the feeling. Your silence makes me doubt the success of canto fourth. If it has failed, I will make such deduction as you think proper and fair from the original agreement; but I could wish whatever is to be paid was remitted to me, without delay, through the usual channel, by course of post. When I tell you that I have not heard a word from England since very early in May, I have made the eulogium of my friends, or the persons who call themselves so, since I have written so often and in the greatest anxiety. Thank God, the longer I am absent, the less cause I see for regretting the country or its living contents.

"I am yours, &c.

P. S. Tell Mr. * * * that * * * * and that I never will forgive him, (or any body,) the atrocious magnitude of their late silence at a time when I wished particularly to hear, for every reason, from my friends."

LETTER CCCLXXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

* Venice, July 10, 1818.

"I have received your letter and the credit-from Morlands, &c., for whom I have also drawn upon you at sixty days' sight for the remainder, according to your last letter."

"I am still waiting in Venice, in expectancy of the arrival of Hanson's clerk. What can detain him, I do not know: but I trust that Mr. Hobhouse and Mr. Kinnaird, when the political fit is abated, will take the trouble to inquire and expedite him, as I have nearly a hundred thousand pounds depending upon the completion of the sale and the signature of the papers."

"The draft on you is drawn up by Siri and Wilhalm. I hope that the form is correct. I signed it two or three days ago, desiring them to forward it to Messrs. Morland and Ransom. Your projected editions for November had better be postponed, as I have some things in project, or preparation, that may be of use to you, though not very important in themselves. I have completed an ode on Venice,* and have two stories, one serious and one ludicrous, (a la Beppo,) not yet finished, and in no hurry to be so.

"You talk of the letter to Hobhouse being much admired, and speak of prose. * I think of writing (for your full edition) some memoirs of my life, to precede to them, upon the same model (though far enough, I fear, from reaching it), of Gifford, Hume, &c.; and this without any intention of making disclosures, or remarks upon living people, which would be unpleasant to them: but I think it might be done, and well done. However, this is to be considered. I have materials in plenty, but the greater part of them could not be used by me, nor for these hundred years to come. However, there is enough of these, and merely as a literary man, to make a preface for such an edition as you meditate. But this is by-the-way: I have not made up my mind.

"I enclose you a note on the subject of 'Persini,' which Hobhouse can dress for you. It is an extract of particulars from a history of Ferrara.

"I trust you have been attentive to Missiaglia, for the English have the character of neglecting the Italians at present, which I hope you will redeem."

"Yours in haste,"

B."

LETTER CCCLXXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

* Venice, July 17, 1818.

"I suppose that Aglietti will take whatever you offer, but till his return from Vienna I can make him no proposal; nor, indeed, have you authorized me to do so. The three French notes are by Lady Mary; also another half-English-French-Italian. They are very pretty and passionate; it is a pity that a piece of one of them is lost. Algarotti seems to have treated her ill; but she was much his senior, and all women are used ill—or say so, whether they are or not.

* * * * * * * *

"I shall be glad of your books and powders. I am still in waiting for Hanson's clerk; I have written repeatedly not at Genoa, but at Venice; all my good friends wrote to me to hasten thence to meet him, but not one had the good sense, or the good nature, to write afterward to tell me that it would be time and a journey..."

* See page 509. The two stories were Masnapo and Don Juan.
† Dedication to the fourth canto of Childe Harold.
‡ See Persius, note. thrown away, as he could not see off for some m with all the period appointed. If I had taken the journey on the general suggestion, I never would have spoken again to one of you as long as I existed. I have written to request Mr. Kinnaird, who the foam of his politics is wiped away, to extract a positive answer from you. I am well and need to keep me in a state of suspense upon the subject.
I hope that Kinnaird, who has my power of attorney, keeps a look-out upon the gentleman, which is the more necessary, as I have a great dislike to the idea of coming over to look after him myself.

"I have several things begun, verse and prose, but none in much forwardness. I have written or me six or seven sheets of a life, which I mean to continue, and send you when finished. It may perhaps serve for your projected editions. If you would tell me exactly (for I know nothing and have no correspondents, except on business) the state of the reception of our late publications, and the feeling upon them, without consulting any delicacies, (I am too seasoned to require them,) I should know how and in what manner to proceed. I should not like to give them too much, which may probably have been the case already; but, as I tell you, I know nothing.

"I once wrote from the fulness of my mind and the love of fame, (not as an end, but as a means, to obtain no influence whatever towards the power in itself and in its consequences,) and now from habit and from avarice; so that the effect may probably be as different as the inspiration. I have the same facility, and indeed necessity, of composition, to avoid idleness, (though idleness in a hot country is a pleasure,) but a much greater indifference to what is to become of it, after it has served my immediate purpose. However, I should on no account like to trouble you, but I won't go on, like the archbishop of Granada, as I am very sure that you dread the fate of Gil Blas, and with good reason.

"Yours, &c.

"P.S. I have written some very savage letters to Mr. Hobhouse, Kinnaird, to you, and to Hanson, because the silence of so long a time made me tear off my remaining rags of patience. I have seen one cr two late English publications which are no great things, except Rob Roy. I shall be glad of Whis-tlecraft."

LETTER CCLXXXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"You may go on with your edition, without calculating on the memoir, which I shall not publish at present. It is nearly finished, but will be too long; and there are so many things, which, out of regard to the living, cannot be mentioned, that I have written with too much detail of that which in-teresed me least; so that my autobiographical essay would resemble the tragedy of Hamlet at the country theatre, recited 'with the part of Hamlet left out by particular desire.' I shall keep it among my papers; it will be a kind of guide-post in case of death, and prevent some of the lies which would there be told and destroy some which have seen to already.

"The tales also are in an unfinished state, and I can fix no time for their completion; they are also not in the best manner. You must not, therefore, calculate upon any time in thing for this edition.
The memoir is already above forty sheets of very large, long paper, and will be about fifty or sixty;
out I wish to go on leisurely; and when finished, although it may not do you a good deal for you at the time, I am not sure that it would serve any good purpose in the end either, as it is full of many passions and prejudices, of which it has been impossible for me to keep clear.—I have not the patience.

"Enclosed is a list of books which Dr. Aglietti would be glad to receive by way of price for his MS letters, if you are disposed to purchase at the rate of fifty pounds sterling. These he will be glad to have as part, and the rest I will give him in money and you may carry it to the account of books, &c.
which is in balance against me, deducting it accordingly. So that the letters are yours, if you like them, at any rate; and he and I are going to hunt for more Lady-Montagne letters, which he thinks of finding. I write in haste. Thanks for the article, and believe me,

"Yours, &c.

LETTER CCLXXXI.

TO CAPT. BASIL HALL.

"DEAR SIR,

"Dr. Aglietti is the best physician, not only in Venice, but in Italy; his residence is on the Grand Canal, and easily found; I forget the number, but I am probably the only person in Venice who don't know it. Bat I am also acquainted with many other of the other medical people here. I regret very much to hear of your indisposition, and shall do myself the honor of waiting upon you the moment
I am up. I write this in bed, and have only just received the letter and note. I beg you to believe that nothing but the extreme lateness of my hours could have prevented me from replying immediately, or coming in person. I have been kept a minute.
The honor to be, very truly,

"Your most obedient servant,

BYRON

VENICE, Sept. 19, 1818.

"An English newspaper here would be a prodigy, or an opposition one a monster; and, except some extracts from extracts in the vile, garbled Paris gazettes, nothing of the kind reaches the Venetian, Lombard public, who are perhaps the most pressed in Europe. My correspondences with England are mostly on business, and chiefly with my solicitor, Mr. Hanson, who has no very exact notion, or extensive conception, of an author's attributes; for he once took up an Edinburgh Review, and, looking at it a minute, said to me, 'So I see you have got into the magazine,' which is the only sentence I ever heard him utter upon literary matters, or the men thereof.

"My first news of your Irish apothecary has, consequently, been from yourself. But, as it will not be forgotten in a hurry, either by your friends or your enemies, I hope to have it more in detail from some of the former, and, in the mean time, I wish you joy with all my heart. Such a moment must have been a good deal better than Westminster Abbey,—besides being an assurance of that one day (many years hence, I trust) into the bargain.

"I am sorry to perceive, however, by the close of your letter, that even you have not escaped the surgery"..." and that your damned deputy has been gathering such a 'dew from the still vest Bermothes'—or rather "..."-

Frays, give me some items of the affair, as you say it is a serious one; and, if it grows worse, you should make a trip over here for a few months, to see how things turn out. I suppose you are a violent admirer of England by your staying so long in it. For my own part, I have passed between the age of one and twenty, and thirty, half the intervenient years out of that not regretting any thing, except that I ever returned to it all, and the gloomy prospect before me of business and parentage obliging me, one day, to return again,—at least, for the transaction of affairs, the signing of papers, and inspecting of children.

I have here my natural daughter, by name Algraga,—a pretty little girl enough, and reckoned like papa. Her mamma is English,—but it is a long story,—and there an end. She is about twenty months old. * * * * *

I have finished the first canto, (a long one, of about one hundred and eighty octaves,) of a poem in the style and manner of 'Beppo!' encouraged by the good success of the same. It is called 'Don Juan,' and is meant to be a little quietly facetious upon every thing. But I doubt whether it is not—at least, as far as it has yet gone—too free for these very modest days. However, I shall try the experiment, anonymously and if it don't take, it will be discontinued. It is dedicated to Southery in good simple, savage verse, upon the * * * * *'s politics, and the way he got them. But the horror of copying it out is intolerable; and if I had an amanuensis he would be of no use, as my writing is so difficult to decipher.

"My poem's Ripe, and is meant to be Divided in twelve books, each book containing With love and war, a heavy gale of war—
A list of ships, and captains, and kings reigning—

New characters, &c., &c.

The above are two stanzas, which I send you as a piece of my Babel, and by which you can judge of the texture of the structure.

In writing the life of Sheridan, never mind the angry lies of the humbug Whigs. Recollect that he was an Irishman and a clever fellow, and that we have had some very pleasant days with him. Don't forget that he was at school at Harrow, where, in my time, we used to show his name—R. B. Sheridan, 1765—as an honor to the walls. Remember * * * * *

Depend upon it that there were worse folks going, of that gang, than ever Sheridan was.

"What did Parr mean by 'haughtiness and coldness?' I listened to him with admiring ignorance, and respectful silence. What more could a talker for fame have?—they don't like to be answered. It was at Payne Knight's I met him, where he gave me more Greek than I could carry away. But I certainly meant to (and did) treat him with the most respectful deference.

I wish you a good night with a Venetian benediction. "E la terra che ti fara!—May you be blessed, and the earth which you will make—"Is it not pretty? You would think it still prettier if you had heard it, as I did two hours ago, from the lips of a Venetian girl, with large black eyes, a face like Faustina's, and the figure of a Juno—tall and energetic as a Pythoness, with eyes flashing, and her dark hair streaming in the moonlight. I must say these women who may be made anything— I am sure if I put a poniard into the hand of this one, she would plunge it where I told her,—and into me, if I offended her. I like this kind of animal, and am sure that I should have preferred Medea to any woman that ever breathed. You may, perhaps, wonder that I don't in that case * * * * *

I could have forgiven the dagger or the bowl, any thing, but the deliberate desolation piled upon me when I stood alone upon my hearth, with my household gods shivered around me. * * * * Do you suppose I have forgotten or forgiven it? It aas comparatively swallowed up in me every other feeling, and I am only a spectator upon earth, till a tenfold opportunity offers. It may come yet. There are others more to be blamed than * * and it is on these that my eyes are fixed unceasingly."

LETTER CCLXXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 20, 1818.

"The opinions which I have asked of Mr. Holhouse and others were with regard to the poetical merit, and not as to what they may think due to the end of the day, which still reads the Bath Guide, Little's Poems, Prior, and Chaucer, to say nothing of Fielding and Smollett. If published, publish entirely, with the above-mentioned exceptions; or you may publish anonymously, or not at all. In the latter event, print fifty on my account, for private distribution.

"Yours, &c.

"I have written to Messrs. Kinnaird and Hobhouse, to desire that they will not erase more than I have requested."

"The second canto of Don Juan is finished in two hundred and six stanzas."

LETTER CCLXXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 27, 1818.

"You will do me the favor to print privately (for private distribution) fifty copies of Don Juan.

* Corrected in this edition.
† This passage remains uncorrected.
* See Don Juan, canto IV., stanza 121.
Byron’s Works.

The list of the men to whom I wish it to be presented, I will send hereafter. The other two poems had best be added to the collective edition: I do not approve of their being published separately. Print Don Juan entire, omitting, of course, the lines on Castlereagh, as I am not on the spot to meet him. I have a second canto ready, which will be sent by-and-by. By this post, I have written to Mr. Hobbhouse, addressed to your care.

P.S. I have acquiesced in the request and representation; and having done so, it’s idle to detail my arguments in favor of my own self-love and Poesie; but I protest. If the poem has poetry, it would stand; if not, fall; the rest is ‘leather and grunels,’ and has never yet affected any human production ‘pro or con.’ Dulness is the only annihilator in such cases. As to the cant of the day, I despise it, as I have ever done all its other finical fashions, which become you as paint became the ancient Britons. If you admit this prudery, you must omit half Arisio, La Fontaine, Shakespeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, Massinger, Ford, all the Charles Second writers;* in short, something of most who have written before Pope and are worth reading, and much of Pope himself. Read him, my dear! don’t do—do—and I will forgive you; though the inevitable consequence would be that you would burn all I have ever written, and all your other wretched Claudians except the day (except Swift and Crabbe), into the bargain. I wrong Claudian, who was a poet, by naming him with such fellows; but he was the ‘ultimus Romanorum,’ the tail of the comet, and these persons are the tail of an old gown cut into a waistcoat for lackey; but being both tails, I have compared one with the other, though very unlike, like all similes.† I write in a passion and a sirocco, and I was up till six this morning at the Carnival; but I protest, as I did in my former letter.”

"After one of the concluding stanzas of the first canto of Don Juan, which ends with (I forget the number)—"

"To have, when the original is dust, A copy, a d—d bad picture, and worse book,‡ insert the following stanza:—"

"What are the hopes of man, &c."

"I have written to you several letters, some with additions, and some upon the subject of the poem itself, which my cursed puritanical committee have protested against publishing. But we will circumvent them on that point. I have not yet begun to copy out the second canto, which is finished, from natural laziness, and the discouragement of the milk and water they have thrown upon the first. I say all this to them as to you, that is, for you to say to them, for I will have nothing underhand. If they had told me the poetry was bad, I would have acquiesced; but they say the contrary, and then talk to me about morality. I shall have to talk to them the same time I heard the word from any body who was not a rascal that used it for a purpose. I maintain that it is the most moral of poems; but if people won’t discover the moral, that is their fault, not mine. I have already written to beg that in any case you will print fifty for private distribution. I will send you the list of persons to whom it is to be sent afterward."

"Within this last fortnight I have been rather indisposed with a rebellion of stomach, which would retain nothing, (liver, I suppose,) and an inability, or fantasy, not to be able to eat of any thing with relish but a kind of Adriatic fish called ‘scampi,’ which happens to be the most indigestible of marine viands. However, within these last two days, I am better, and very truly yours."

Letter Cccxxxvi.

Venice, April 5, 1819.

"The second canto of Don Juan was sent, on Saturday last, by post, in four packets, two of four, and two of three sheets each, containing in all two hundred and seventeen stanzas, octave measure. But I will permit no curtailments, except those mentioned above about Castlereagh and..."

* * * * * You shan’t make canticles of my cantos. The poem will please, if it is lively; if it is stupid, it will fail: but I will have none of your damned cutting and putting it by. If you please more anonymously: it will, perhaps, be better; but I will battle my way against them all, like a porcupine.

"So you and Mr. Foscolo, &c., want me to undertake what is a ‘great work’ in poetry. I suppose, or some such pyramid. I’ll try no such thing: I hate tasks. And then ‘seven or eight years!’ God send us all well this day three months, let alone years. If one’s years can’t be better employed than in swearing poesy, a man had better be a ditcher. And works, too!—a Child Harold nothing! You have so many ‘divine’ poems, is it nothing to have written a human one? without any of your worn-out machinery. Why, man, I could have spun the thoughts of the four cantos of that poem into twenty, had I wanted to book-make, and its passion into as many modern tragedies. Since you want length, you shall have enough of Juan, for I’ll make fifty cantos."

"And Foscolo, too! Why does he not do something more than the Letters of Otis, and a tragedy and pamphlets? He has got fifteen years of his command that he has: what has he done all that time?—proved his genius, doubtless, but not fixed its fame, nor done his utmost.

"Besides, I mean to write my best work in English, and it will take me nine years more thoroughly to master the language; and then if my fancy exists, and I exist too, I will try what I can do really. As to the estimation of the English, which you talk of, let them calculate what it is worth, before they insult me with their insolent condescension.

"I have not written for their pleasure. If they are pleased, it is that they chose to be so; I have never flattered their opinions, nor their pride; nor will I. Neither will I make ‘advice’ books, ‘al dilettar le femine e la plebe,’‡ I have written from the fulness of my mind, from passion, from impulse, from many motives, but not for their sweet voices.

"I know the precious worth of popular applause; for few scribblers have had more of it; and if I chose to swerve into their paths, I could retain it, or resume it. But I neither love ye, nor fear ye; and though I buy with ye, and sell with ye, I will neither eat with ye, nor drink with ye, nor pray with ye. They made me, without my search, a species of popular idol; they, without reason or judgment, beyond the caprice of their good pleasure, threw down the image from its pedestal: it was not broken with the fall, and they would, it seems, again replace it,—but they shall not.

"You ask about my health: about the beginning of the year I was in a state of great exhaustion, but..."
attended by such debility of stomach that nothing remained upon it; and I was obliged to reform my way of life, which was conducting me from the yellow leaf to the ground, with all deliberate speed. I am better in health and morals, and very much more, &c.

"P. S. I have read Hodgson's 'Friends.'

"He is right in defending Pope against the bastard pelicans of the poetical winter day, who add insult to their parrycide by suckling the blood of the parent of English real poetry—poetry without fault—and then spurning the bosom which fed them."

LETTER CCLXXXVII.

TO THE EDITOR OF GALIONIAN'S MESSENGER.

"Sir,

"In various numbers of your journal, I have seen a mentioned a work entitled 'the Vampire,' with the addition of my name as that of the author. I am not the author, and never heard of the work in question until now. In a more recent paper I perceive a formal announcement of 'the Vampire,' with the addition of an account of my 'residence on the Island of Mitylene,' an island which I have occasionally sailed by in the course of travelling some years ago through the Levant—and where I should have no objection to reside, but where I have never yet resided. Neither of these performances are mine, and I presume that it is neither unjust nor ignoerasious to request that you will favor me by contradicting the advertisement to which I allude. If the book is clever, it would be base to deprive the real writer, whoever he may be, of his honours; and if stupid, I desire the responsibility of nobody's dulness but my own. You will excuse the trouble I give you; the imputation is of no great importance, and as long as it was confined to surmises and reports, I should have received it, as I received many others, in silence. But the formality of a public advertisement of a book I never wrote, and a residence where I never resided, is a little too much; particularly as I have no notion of the contents of the one, nor the incidents of the other. I have besides, a personal dislike to 'Vampires,' and the little acquittance I have with them would by no means induce me to divulge their secrets. You did me much less injury by your paragraphs about 'my devotion' and 'abandonment of society for the sake of religion,' which appeared in your Messenger during last Lent, all of which are not founded on fact, but you see I do not contradict them, because they are merely personal, whereas the others in some degree concern the reader. You will oblige me by complying with my request of contradiction—I assure you that I know nothing of the work or works in question, and have the honor to be (as the correspondents to Magazines say) 'your constant reader,' and very "Obst. humble serv't,

LETTER CCLXXXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Sir,

"I have got your extract, and the 'Vampire.' I need not say it is not mine. There is a rule to go by: you are my publisher, (till we quarrel,) and what is not published by you is not written by me.

"By Doctor Prout.

"Next week I set out for Romagna—at least in all probability. You had better go on with the publications, without waiting to hear farther. For I have other things in my head. 'Mazepa' and the 'Ode separata'—what think you? Joan anonymus, 'without designation;' for I am a shabby, and attack Southey under cloud of night.

"Yours &c.""

In another letter on the subject of the Vampire are the following particulars.

LETTER CCLXXXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"'The story of Shelley's agitation is true.' I can't tell what seized him, for he don't want courage. He was once with me in a gale of wind, in a small boat, right under the rocks between Messlerie and St. Gingo. We five in the boat, two boatmen, and ourselves. The sail was mismanaged, and the boat was filling fast. He can't swim. I stripped off my coat, made him strip off his, and take hold of an ear, and thought (being myself an expert swimmer) I could save him, if he would not struggle when I took hold of him—unless we got smashed against the rocks, which were high and sharp, with an awkward surf on them at that minute. We were then about a hundred yards from the shore, and the boat in peril. He answered me, with the greatest coolness, 'that he had no notion of being saved, and that I would have enough to do to save myself, and begged not to trouble me.' Luckily, the boat righted, and, bailing, we got round a point into St. Gingo, where the inhabitants came down and embraced the boatmen on their escape, the wind having been high enough to tear up some huge trees from the Alps above us, as we saw next day.

"And yet the same Shelley, who was as cool as it was possible to be in such circumstances, (of which I am no judge myself, as the chance of swimming naturally gives self-possession when near shore,) certainly had the fit of fantasy which Polidori describes, though not exactly as he describes it.

"The story of the agreement to write the ghost books is true, but the ladies are not sisters.

"Mary Godwin (now Mrs. Shelley) wrote Frankenstein, which you have reviewed, thinking it Shelley's. Mr. Godwin is a wonderful book for a girl of nineteen, not nineteen, indeed, at that time. I en close you the beginning of mine, by which you will see how far it resembles Mr. Colburn's publication. If you choose to publish it, you may, statating why, and with such explanatory proem as you please. I never went on with it, as you will perceive by the date. I began it in an old account-book of Miss Milbanke's, which I kept, because it contained the word 'Housew' written in her twice as the inside blank page of the covers, being the only two scraped I have in the world in her writing, except her name to the deed of separation. Her letters I sent back, except those of the quarrelling, correspondenc, and those, being documents, are placed in the hands of a third person, with copies of several of my own; that I have no kind of memorial whatever of her, but these two words,—her actions, I have torn the leaves containing the part of the tale out of the book, and enclose them with this sheet.

* This story, as given in the Preface to the 'Vampire,' is as follows:—It appears that one evening Lord B. Mr. P. B. Shelley, two indies, and the gentleman before alluded to, after having perused a German work entitled Phantasmagoria, began relating ghost stories, when his hostipal having received the beginning of Christabel, then unpublished, the whole took an as mon of Mr. Shelley's mind, that he suddenly started up, and ran out of the room. The physician and Lord Byron followed, and discovered him leaning against a mantel-piece, with cold drops of perspiration trickling down his face. The gentleman given him something to refresh him, upon inquiring into the cause of his alarm, they found that his wild imagination had pictured to him the bosom of one of the ladies with eyes, (which was reported of a lady in the neighbourhood where he lived,) he was obliged to leave the room in order to destroy the illusion.

What do you mean? First, you seem hurt by my letter, and then, is your next, you talk of its 'power,' and so forth. 'This is a d—d blind story, Jack; but never mind, go on.' You may be sure I will put me 'in a frenzy, I will never call you Jack again.' I remember nothing of the epistle at present.

What do you mean by Polidori's Diary? Why, I defy him to say anything about me, but he is welcome. I have nothing to reproach me with on this score, and I am much mistaken if that is not his own opinion. But why publish the name of two girls? and, in such a manner?—what a blundering piece of exhibition.' He asked Pictet, &c., to dinner, and of course was left to entertain himself. I went into society solely to present him, (as I told him,) that he might return into good company if he chose; it was the best thing for his youth and circumstances: for myself, I had done with society, and, having presented him, withdrew to my own 'way of life.' It is true that I returned without satisfaction, but I looked to have a terrier, a hare, because I saw it full. It is true that Mrs. Hervey (she writes novels) fainted at my entrance into Copet, and then came back again. On her fainting, the Duchesse de Broglie exclaimed, 'This is too much at sixty-five years of age!' I never gave the 'English' an opportunity of avoiding me, but I trust that if ever I do, they will seize it. With regard to Maseppa and the Ode, you may join or separate them, as you please, from the two cantos.

'Don't suppose I want to put you out of humor. I have a great respect for your good and gentlemanly qualities, and return your personal friendship towards me; and although I think you a little spoiled by 'villainous company,'—writes, persons of humor about town, authors, and fashionables, together with your 'I am just going to call at Carlton House, are you walking that way? '—I say, notwithstanding 'pictures, taste, Shakspere, and the musical glasses,' you deserve and possess the esteem of those whose esteem is worth having, and of none more (however useless it may be) than yours very sincerely, &c., P. S. Make my respects to Mr. Gifford. I am perfectly aware that 'Don Juan' must set us all by the ears, but that is my concern, and my beginning. There will be the 'Edinburgh' and all too, against it, so that, like 'Rob Roy,' I shall have my hands full.

LETTER CCCC.
TO MR. MURRAY.

* Venice, May 26, 1818.

I have received no proofs by the last post, and shall probably have quitted Venice before the arrival of the next. There wanted a few stanzas to the termination of canto first in the last proof: the next will, I presume, contain them, and the whole a perusal of canto second; but I am able to write for farther answers from me, as I have directed that my letters wait for my return, (perhaps in a month, and probably so;) therefore do not wait for farther answers from Venice. You may, perhaps, by the wind and weather— for it will at least convey your accents a little farther than they would otherwise have gone; whereas I shall neither echo nor acquiesce in your exquisite reasons. You may omit the note of reference to Hobhouse's travels, in canto second and you will put as motto to the whole—'

—Difficult on purely commonsense views.'—Horace.

'A few days ago I sent you all I know of Polidori's Vampire. He may do, or say what he pleases, but I wish he would not attribute to me his own compositions. If he has any thing of mine in his possession, the manuscript will put it beyond controversy; but I scarcely think that any one who knows me would believe the thing in the Magazines to be mine, even if they saw it in my own handwriting.

'I write to you in the agencies of a nurse, which annihilates me; and I have been for the last four days not only to do four things since dinner, which are as well emitted in very hot weather, firstly, * * *; secondly, to play at billiards from ten to twelve, under the influence of lighted lamps, that doubled the heat thirdly, to go afterward into a red-hot conversation of the Countess Benzonii's; and fourthly, to begin this letter at three in the morning: but being begun it must be finished.

'Ever very truly and affectionately yours, B.'

P. S. I petition for tooth-brushes, powder, magnesia, Macassar oil, (or Russian,) the sashes, and Sir NI. Wraxall's Memoirs of his Own Times. I want, besides, a few English and foreign dogs; and I want (is it Buck?) a life of Richard Third, advertised by Longman, long, long, long ago; I asked for it at least three years since. See Long man's advertisement.'

LETTER CCCCXI.
TO MR. HOPPER.

'A journey in an Italian June is a consolation and if I was not the most constant of men, I should now be swimming from the Lido, instead of smoking in the dust of Padua. Should there be letters from England, let them wait my return. And do look at my house and (not lands, but) waters, and esco; and deal out the money to Edgecombe with an air of reluctance and a shake of the head—and put queer questions to him—and turn up your nose when he answers.

'Take my respects to the Consuls—and to the Chevalier—and to Sestin—and to all the counts and countesses of our acquaintance.

And believe me ever
"Your disconsolate and affectionate, &c."'

LETTER CCCCXII.
TO MR. HOPPER.

* Venice, June 6, 1819.

'I am at length arrived to Bologna, where I am settled like a savage, and shall be bribed like one, if this weather continues. Will you thank Mangel on my part for the Ferrara acquaintance, which was a very agreeable one. I stayed two days at Ferrara, and was much subjected to the Count Mosti, and the little shortness of the time permitted me to see of his family. I went to his conversations, which is very far superior to any thing of the kind at Venice—the women almost all young—several pretty—and the men courteous and cleanly. The lady of the mansion, who is young, lately mar-
ed, and with child, appeared very pretty by candlelight, (I did not see her by day,) pleasing in her manners, and very lady-like, or thorough-bred, as we call it in England,—a kind of thing which reminds one of a fairer, and an admired Italian ground. She seems very fond of her husband, who is amiable and accomplished; he has been in England two or three times, and is young. The sister, a Countess somebody—I forget what—they read both Milton by birth, and Veronese of course—is a lady of more display; she sings and plays divinely; but I thought she was too—indeed long about it. Her likeness to Madame Flahaut (Miss M——,) I have never seen anything extraordinary quite equal to, and I was one day suddenly surprised by her in the Cardinal Legate’s red stockings.

I had but a bird’s-eye view of these people, and shall not probably see them again; but I am very much obliged to Mengaldo for letting me see them at all. Whenever I meet with any thing agreeable in this world, it surprises me so much, and pleases me so much, (when my passions are not interested one way or the other,) that I go on wondering for a week to come. I feel, too, in great admiration of the Cardinal Legate’s red stockings.

I found, too, such a pretty epitaph in the Certosa cemetery, or rather two: one was—

> "Martial Lugi > Impiose pace!"

and the other,

> "Laurolo Pielz > Impiose eerno quilet."

That was all: but it appears to me that these two and three words comprise and compress all that can be said on the subject,—and then, in Italian, they are absolute music. They contain doubt, hope, and humility; nothing can be more pathetic than the ‘implores’ and the modesty of the request:—they have had enough of life—they want nothing but rest—they implore it, and ‘eterna quilet.’ It is like a Greek inscription in some good old heathen ‘city of the dead.’ Pray, if I am shovelled into the Lido churchyard in your time, let me have the ‘implores pace,’ and nothing else, for my epitaph. I never met with any, ancient or modern, that pleased me a tenth part so much.

"In about a day or two after you receive this letter, I will thank you to desire Edgecombe to prepare for my return. I shall go back to Venice before I leave Venice. I shall stay but a few days in Bologna. I am just going out to see sights, and shall not present my introductory letters for a day or two, till I have run over again the place and pictures; nor perhaps at all, if I find that I have books and sights enough to do without the inhabitants. After that, I shall return to Venice, where you may expect me about the eleventh, or perhaps sooner. Pray make my thanks acceptable to Mengaldo; my respects to the Consul, and to Mr. Scott.

"I hope my daughter is well." Ever yours, and truly, P.S. I went over the Aristeo MS., &c, &c. again at Ferrara, with the castle, and cell, and house, &c, &c.

One of the Ferrarese asked me if I knew Lord Byron, an acquaintance of his name at Naples. I told him ‘No!’ which was true both ways; for I knew not an impostor, and, in the other, no one knew himself. He stared ‘till told that I was ‘the real Simon Pure.’ Another asked me if I had not translated ‘Tasso.’ You see what fame is! how accurate! how boundless! I was not surprised at that; but after other feel, and I always feel the lighter and the better looked on when I have got rid of mine; it sits on me like armor on the Lord Mayor’s champion; and I got rid of all the husk of literature, and the attendant babble, by a very curious thing, that I have not translated ‘Tasso,’ but a namesake had; and by the blessing of Heaven, I looked so little like a poet, that everybody believed me.”
"Before I left Venice, I had returned to you your late, and Mr. Hobhouse’s, sheafs of Juan. Don’t wait for farther answers from me, but address yours to Venice, as usual. I know nothing of my own movements; I may return there in a few days, or not for some time. All this depends on circumstances. I left Mr. Hoppner very well. My daughter Allegra was sitting there in evening pretty; her hair is growing darker, and her eyes are blue. Her temper and her ways, Mr. Hoppner says, are like mine, as well as her features: she will make, in that case, a manageable young lady.

"I have never heard anything of Ada, the little Electra of my Mycenae. * * * But there will come a day of reckoning, even if I should not live to see it. I have at least seen Romilly’s shivered, who was one of my assassins. When that man was doing his worst to uproot my whole family, tree, branch, and blossoms—when, after taking my retainer, he went over to them—when, he was bringing desolations on my children, I destroy heart on my household gods?—did he think that, in less than three years, a natural event—a severe, domestic, but an expected and common calamity—would lay his career in a cross road, or stamp his name in a Verdict of Lunacy! Did he (who in his sexença * * *) reflect or consider what my feelings must have been, when wife, and child, and sister, and name, and fame, and country, were to be my sacrifice on his legal altar—and this at a moment when my health was declining, my fortune embarrassed, and my mind had been shaken by many kinds of disappointment—while I was yet young, and might have reformed what might be wrong in my conduct, and retrieved what was perplexing in my affairs! But he is in his grave, and * * * * * * * * What a long letter I have scribbled!"

"Yours, &c.

"P. S. Here, as in Greece, they strew flowers on the tombs. I saw a quantity of rose-leaves, and entire roses, scattered over the graves at Ferrara. It has the most pleasing effect you can imagine."

LETTER CCCCXCVI.

* * * * * * *

"I wrote to you from Padua, and from Bologna, and since from Ravenna. I find my situation very agreeable, but want my horses very much, there being good riding in the environs. I can fix no time for my return to Venice—it may be soon or late—or not at all—it all depends on the Donna;† whom I found very seriously in bed with a cough and spitting blood, &c., all of which has subsided. * * * *

I found all the people here firmly persuaded that she would never recover;—they were mistaken, however.

"My letters were useful as far as I employed them, and I like both the place and people, though I don’t trouble the latter more than I can help.

She manages very well— * * * *

but if I come away with a stiletto in my gizzard some fine afternoon, I shall not be astonished. I can’t make him out at all—he visits me frequently, and takes me out (like Whittington, the Lord Mayor) or in a coach and six horses. The fact appears to be, that he is completely governed by—for the matter, or what the people here don’t know what to make of us, as he has the character of jealousy with all his wives—this is the third. He is the richest of the Ravennese, by their own account, but is not popular among them.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * Now do, pray, send off Augustine, and carriage and cattle, to Bologna, without fail or delay, or I shall lose my patient. The letter he wrote not of this. My coming, going, and every thing depend upon him entirely, just as Mrs. Hoppner (to whom I remit my reverences) said in the true spirit of female propriety.

"You are but a shabby fellow not to have written before. And I am truly yours, &c."

LETTER CCCCXCV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

* Ravenna, June 29, 1819.

"The letters have been forwarded from Venice, but I trust that you will not have waited for further alterations—I will make none. You ask me to spare Romilly—ask the worms. His dust can suffer nothing from the truth being spoken—and if it could, how did he behave to me? You may talk to the wind, which will carry the sound—and to the caves, which will echo you—but not to me, on the subject of a * * * * a wronged me—whether dead or alive.

"I have no time to return you the proofs—publish without them. I am glad you think the poesy good; and as to ‘thinking of the effect,’ think you of the sale, and leave me to pluck the porcupines who may point their quills at you.

"I have been here (at Ravenna) these four weeks, having left Venice a month ago:—I came to see my ‘Amica,’ the Countess-Guiccioli, who has been, and still continues, very unwell. * * * *

She is only twenty years old, but not a strong constitution. * * * *

She has a perpetual cough, and an intermittent fever, but is up most gallantly in every sense of the word. Her husband (this is his third wife) is the richest noble of Ravenna, and almost of Romagna; he is also not the youngest, being upwards of threescore, but in good preservation. All this will appear strange to you, who do not understand the meridian morality, nor our way of life in such respects, and I cannot at present expound the difference—but you would find it much the same in these parts. At Faenza there is Lord * * * * with an opera girl; and at the inn in the same town is a Neapolitan Prince, who serves the wife of the Gonfoliere of that city. I am on duty here—so you see ‘God fan tuts e tritte.’

"I have my horses here, saddle as well as carriage, and ride or drive every day in the forest the Pineta, the scene of Boccaccio’s novel, and Dryden’s fable of Honorius, &c., &c.; and I see my Dama every day * * * *; but I feel seriously uneasy about her health, which seems very precarious. In losing her, I should lose a being who has run great risks on my account, and whom I have every reason to love—but I must not think this possible. I do not know what I should do if she died, but I ought to blow my brains out—and I hope that I should. Her husband is a very polite personage, but I wish she would not carry me in his coach and six like Whittington and his cat.

"You ask me if I mean to continue Don Juan, &c. How should I know? What encouragement
LETTERS.

LETTER CCCXCVI.

"Ravenna, July 2, 1819.

"Thank you for your letter and for Madame's. I will answer it directly. Will you recollect whether I did not consign to you one or two receipts of Madame Moccingo's for house-rent—(I am not sure of this, but think I did—if not, they will be in my drawers)—and will you desire Mr. Dorville* to have the goodness to see if EDGEcombe has receipts to his payments hitherto made by him on my account, and that there are no debts at Venice? On your answer, I shall send order of farther remittance to carry on my household expenses, as my present return to Venice is very problematical; and it may happen—but I can say nothing positive—every thing with me being indecisive and undecided, except the disgust which Venice excites when fairly compared with any other city in this part of Italy. When I say Venice, I mean the Venetians—the city itself is superb as its history—but the people are what I never thought them till they taught me to think so.

"The best way will be to leave Allegra with Antonio's spouse till I can decide something about her and myself—but I thought you would have had an answer from Mrs. V—-.

"You have had bore enough with me and mine already.

"Ligrely fear that the Guiccioli is going into a consumption, to which her constitution tends. Thus it is with every thing and every body for whom I feel any thing like a real attachment.—War, death, or discord, doth lay seige to them. I never even could keep alive a dog that I liked or that liked me. Her symptoms are obstinate cough of the lungs, and occasional fevers, &c., &c., and there are latent causes of an eruption in the skin, which she foolishly repulsed into the system two years ago; but I have made them send her case to Aglietti; and have begged him to come—if only for a day or two—to consult upon her state.

"If it would not bore Mr. Dorville, I wish he would keep an eye on Edgecombe and on my other rags-muffins. I might have more to say, but I am absorbed about La Gui, and her illness. I cannot tell you the effect it has upon me.

"The horses came, &c., &c., and I have been galloping through the pine forest daily.

"Believe me, &c.

"P. S. My benediction on Mrs. Hopper, a pleasant journey among the Bernese tyrants, and safe return. You ought to bring back a platiotic Bernese for my reformation. If any thing happens to my present Amica, I have done with the passion for ever—it is my last love. As to libertinism, I have sickened myself of that, as was natural in the way I went on, and I have at least derived that advantage from vice, to lose in the better sense of the word. This will be my last adventure;—I can hope to more to inspire attachment, and I trust never again to feel it."

LETTER CCCXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, August 1, 1819.

"[Address your answer to Venice, however.]

"Don't be alarmed. You will see me defend my self gaily—that is, if I happen to be in spirits and by spirits, I don't mean your meaning of the word, but the spirit of a bull-dog when pinched, or a bull when pined; it is then that they make best sport: and my sensations under an attack are probably a happy compound of the united energies of these amiable animals, you may perhaps see what Marrall calls 'rare sport,' and some good tossing and going-on the course of the controversy. But I must be in the right cue first, and I doubt I am almost too far off to be in a sufficient fury for the purpose. And then I have effeminated and ener-getized myself with love and the summer in these last two months.

"I wrote to Mr. Hobhouse the other day, and foretold that Juan would either fall entirely or succeed completely; there will be no medium. Appearances are not favorable; but as you write this day after publication, it can hardly be decided what opinion will predominate. You seem in a fright, and doubtless with cause. Come what may, I never thought of the million's cantatrice, and as the circumstances are such that they may not have placed me at times in a situation to lead the public opinion, but the public opinion never less, nor even shall lead me. I will not set on a degraded throne, so pray keep Messrs. * * * or * * * or Tom Moore, or * * * upon it; they will all of them be transported with their coronation.

"P. S. The Countess Guiccioli is much better than she was. I sent you, before leaving Venice, the real original sketch which gave rise to the 'Vampire,' &c. Did you get it?"

LETTER CCCXCVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, August 9, 1819.

"Talking of blunders reminds me of Ireland—Irland of Moore. What is this I see in Galignani about 'Bermuda,—agent,—deputy,—appeal,—attachment,' &c. What is the matter? Is it any thing in which his friends can be of use to him? Pray inform me.

"Of Don Juan I hear nothing farther from you; * * * but the papers don't seem so fierce as the letter you sent me seemed to anticipate, by their extracts at least in Galignani's Messenger. I never saw such a set of fellows as you are! And then the pains taken to exculpate the modest publisher—he represented, forsooth! I will write a preface that shall exculpate you and * * * * * &c., * * * completely on that point; but, at the same time, I will cut you up like gourds. You have no more soul than the Count de Caylus (who assured his friends, on his death-bed, that he had none, and that he must know better than they whether he had one or no), and no more blood than a water-melon! And I see there hath been asterisks, and what Perry used to call 'domed cutting and slashing—but, never mind.

"I write in haste. To-morrow I set off for Bograna. I write to you with thunder, lightning, &c, and all the winds of heaven whispering through my hair, and the remembrance of preparation to boot. 'My mis-ress dear, who hath fed my heart upon smiles and wine" for the last two months, set off with her husband for Bologna this morning, and it seems that I follow him at three to-morrow morning. I cannot tell how our romance will end, but it hath gone on hitherto most erotically. Such perils and scenes of danger, such as love is wont to play in comparison.

The fools think that all my poesy is always allusive to my own adventures; I have had at one time or another better and more extraordinary events than those, two-thirds of the world, if I tell them, but that must never be.

"I hope Mrs. M. has accosted.

"Yours ever.""

LETTER CCCXIX.

"Bologna, August 19, 1819.

"I do not know how far I may be able to reply to your letter, for I am not very well to-day. Last night we went to the representation of Alfredo, of Mirra, the last two acts of which threw me into convulsions. I do not mean by that word a lady's hysterics, but the agony of reluctant tears, and the choking shudder, which I do not often undergo for fiction. This is but the second time in my life I have felt the effect of any thing under the reality; the first was on seeing Kean's Sir Giles Overreach. The worst was, that the 'Dana,' in whose box I was, went off in the same way, I really believe more from fright than any other sympathy—which at least with the players: but she had been ill and I have been ill, and we are all languid and pathetic this morning, with great expenditure of salt volatile.

But, to return to your letter of the 2d of July.

"You are right, Gifford is right, Crabbe is right, Hobhouse is right—you are all right, and I am all wrong; but do, pray, let me have that pleasure. Cut me up root and branch; quarter me in the Quarterly; send round my 'disjecta membra poetae,' like those of the Levite's concubine; make me if you will a spectacle to men and angels; but don't ask me to alter, for I won't—I am obstinate and lazy—and there's the truth.

"But, nevertheless, I will answer your friend Perry, who objects to the quick succession of fun and gravity, as if in that case the gravity did not (at least) heighten the fun. His metaphor is, that 'we are never clear of one drencher and drencher at the same time.' Blessings on his experience! Ask him these questions 'bout 'searching and drenching.' Did he never play at cricket, or walk a mile in hot weather? Did he never spill a dish of tea over himself in handing the cup to his charmer, to the great shame of his nankeen breeches? Did he never swim in the sea at noonday with the sun in his eyes and on his head, which all the foam of ocean could not cool? Did he never draw his foot out of too hot water, d—ning his eyes and his valet's?—

"Was he ever in a Turkish bath—that marvellous paradise of sherbet and * * *? Was he ever in a cauldron of boiling oil, like St. John? or in the sulphurous waves of h—l? (where he ought to be for his 'searching and drenching at the same time.') Did he never tumble in a river or lake, and sit in his wet clothes in the boat, or on the bank afterward, 'searched and drenched,' like a true sportsman?—Oh for breath to utter!—but make him my compatriot, and he'll be a clever fellow for all that—a very clever fellow.

"You ask me for the plan of Donny Johnny: I have no plan; I had no plan; but I had or have materials; that is but like Tom Lumpsquirt, 'I am to be snubbed so when I am in spirits,' the poet will be nought, and the poet turn serious again. If it don't take, I will leave it off where it is, with all due respect to the public; but if continued, it must be in my own way. You might as well made Hamlet (or Diggory) 'act mad' in a straight waistcoat as trammel my buffoonery, if I am to be a buffoon; their gestures and my thoughts would only be pitiable—do—silly absurdities: compare me, the soul of such writing is its license; at least the liberty of that license, if one likes—not that one should abuse it. It is like trial by jury and peepers and the system of the very absurdity. A man, in the revolution; because no one wishes to be tried for the mere pleasure of proving his possession of the privilege.

"But a truce with these reflections. You are too earnest and eager about a work never intended to be serious. Do you suppose that I could have any intention but to giggle and make giggles—a playful satire, with as little poetry as could be helped, was what I meant. And as to the indecency, do pray, read in Boswell what Johnson, the sullen moralist, says of Prior and Paul Fungote.

"Will you get a favor done for me? You can, by your government friends, Croker, Canzign; or my old schoolfellow, Jefferey! Will you ask them to appoint (without salary or emolument) a noble Italian (whom I will name afterward) consul or vice-consul for Ravenna? He is a man of a noble family, of large property, and a man who has wished to have a British protection in case of changes. Ravenna is near the sea. He wants no emolument whatever. That his office would be useful, I know; as I lately sent off from Ravennatico Trestie a poor devil of an English sailor, who had remained there sick, sorry, and penniless (having been set ashore in 1814), from the want of any accredited agent able or willing to help him homewards. Would it not be well if I do, I will then send his name and condition, subject of course to rejection, if not approved when known.

"I know that in the Levant you make consuls and vice-consuls, perpetually, of foreigners. This man is a patrician, and has twelve thousand a year. His motive is a British protection in case of invasion. Do you think Croker would do it for us? To be sure, my interest is rare! but perhaps a brother in the Tory line might do a good turn at the request of so harmless and long absent a whig, particularly as there is no salary or burthen of any sort to be annexed to the office.

I can write no more this day. How I should pay upon it as a great obligation; but, alas! that very circumstance may, very probably, operate to the contrary—in deed, it ought; but I have, at least, been an honest and an emolument.)

Your friend,

Byron."

won't have such as that in a hurry from Mr. Fitzgerald. You may publish it with my name, en' ye wool. He deserves all praise, bad and good; it was a very noble piece of principalcy. Would you like an epigram—a translation?

You could meet ten thousand pinnacles

LETTER CCCCI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Bologna, August 23, 1819.

"I send you a letter to Roberts, signed 'Wortley Clutterbuck,' which you may publish in what form you please, in answer to his article. I have had many proofs of men's absurdity, but he beats all in folly. Why, the wolf in sheep's clothing has tumbled into the very trap! We'll strip him. The letter is written 'in great haste, and amid a thousand vexations. All my letter only came yesterday, so that there is no time to polish: the post goes out to-morrow. The date is 'Little Piddington.' Let * * * correct the press: he knows and can read the handwriting. Continue to keep the anonymous about 'Juan': it helps us to fight against overwhelming numbers. I have a thousand distractions at present; so excuse haste, and wonder I can act or write at all. Answer by post, as usual. "Yours."

"P.S. If I had had time, and been quieter and nearer, I would have cut him to hash; but as it is, you can judge for yourselves.

LETTER CCCCII.

TO THE COUNTESS GIUCCIOLA.

"My dearest Teresa,—I have read this book in your garden;—my love, you were absent, or else I could not have read it. It is a favorite book of yours, and the writer was a friend of mine. You will not understand these English words, and others will not understand them,—which is the reason I have not scrawled them in Italian. But you will recognise the handwriting of him who passionately loved you, and you will divine that, over a book which was yours, he could only think of love. In that word, beautiful in all languages, but most so in yours—Amor meo—is comprised my existence here and hereafter. I feel I exist here, and fear that I shall exist hereafter,—to what purpose you will decide; my destiny rests with you, and you are a woman, eighteen years of age, and two out of a convent. I wish that you had stayed there, with all my heart,—or, at least, that I had never met you in your married state.

"But all this is too late. I love you, and you love me,—at least, you say so, and act as if you did so, which last is a great consolation in all events. But I more than love you, and cannot cease to love you.

"Think of me, sometimes, when the Alps and the ocean divide us,—but they never will, unless you wish it. "BYRON."

LETTER CCCCIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Bologna, August 29, 1819.

"I wrote to you by last post enclosing a buffoon ing letter for publication, addressed to the buffoon Roberts, who has thought proper to tie a camisole to his own tail. If it was written counterfeit, and in the midst of circumstances not very favorable to factiousness, so that there may, perhaps, be more bitterness than enough for that sort of small acid punch:—now, I trust, tell me.

"Keep the anonymous, in any case: it helps what fun there may be. But if the matter grows serious about Don Juan, and you feel yourself in a scrap, or me either, even that I am the author. I will never shrink; but if you do, I can always answer you in the question of Guatimozin to his minister,—each bring on his own coals."

"I wish that I had been in better spirits; but I am out of sorts, out of nerves, and now and then (I begin to fear) out of my senses. All this Italy has done for me, and not England. I defy all you, and your climate to boot, to make me mad. But if ever I do really become a bedlamite, and wear a strait waistcoat, let me be brought back among you; your people will then be proper company.

"I assure you what I here say and feel has nothing to do with England, either in a literary or personal point of view. All my present pleasures or plagues are as Italian as the opera. And after all, they are but trifles; for all this arises from n'y Dama's being in the country for three days. (At Capo-Fiume.) But as I could never live but for one human being at a time, and, I assure you, that one has never been myself, as you may know by the consequences, for the selfish are successful in life,) I feel alone and unhappy.

"I have sent for my daughter from Venice, and I ride daily, and walk in a garden, under a purple canopy of grapes, and sit by a fountain, and talk with the gardener of his tools, which seem greater than Adam's, and with his wife, and with his son's wife, who is the youngest of the party, and I think, talks best of the three. Then I revisited the Camp O Santa, and my old friend, the sexton, has two—but one the prettiest daughter imaginable; and I amuse myself with contrasting her beautiful and innocent face of fifteen, with the skulls with which he has peopled several cells, and particularly with that of one skull dated 1766, which was once covered (the tradition goes) by the most lovely features of Bologna—noble and rich. When I look at these, and at this girl,—when I think of what they were, and what she must be,—why, then, my dear Murray, I won't shuck you by saying what I think. It is little men who become of us 'boarded men,' but I don't like the notion of a beautiful woman's last living less than a beautiful tree—than her own picture—her own shadow, which won't change so to the sun as her face to the mirror. I must kerve off for my head aches consumedly. I have never been quite well since the night of the representation of Allieri's Missa, a fortnight ago.

chase of men. I bought it. The next day, on shoeing the horse, we discovered the thrush,—the assassin being warranted to be in the contract and the money. The lieutenant desired to speak with me in person. I consented. He came. It was his own particular request. He began a story and asked him if I should return the money. He said no—but he would exchange. He asked an exorbitant price for his other horses. I told him that he was a thief. He said he was an officer and a man of honor, and pulled out a Parma ribbon by design. I answered, that as he was an officer, I would treat him as such: and that as to being a gentieman, he might prove it by returning the money; as for his Parma passport, I thought it more valuable if more it had been a Parmesan cheese. I answered in high terms, and said that if it were in the morning (it was about eight o'clock in the evening), he would have satisfaction. I then lost my temper.

"As for that," I replied, "you shall have it directly,—it will be mutual satisfaction, I can assure you. You are a thief, and, as you say, an officer: my pistols are in the next room, loaded; take one of them, and make your choice of weapons." He replied that pistols were English weapons; he always fought with the sword. I told him that I was able to accommodate him, having three regimental swords in a drawer near us; and he might take the longest, and put himself on guard.

"All this passed in presence of a third person. He then said, "No, but to-morrow morning he would give me the meeting at any time or place. I answered that it was not usual to appoint meetings in the presence of witnesses, and that we had best speak man to man, and appoint time and instrument. In the meantime, leaving the room, the Lieutenant, before he could shut the door after him, ran out, roaring 'help and murder most lustily, and fell into a sort of hysteria in the arms of about fifty people, who all saw that I had no weapon of any sort or kind about me, and followed him, asking him what the devil was the matter with him. Nothing would do: he ran away without his hat, and went to bed, ill of the fright. He then tried his complaint at the police, which dismissed it as frivolous. He is, I believe, gone away, or going.

"The horse was warranted, but, I believe, so were the wheels. I am not obliged to refund, according to law. He endeavored to raise up an indictment of assault and battery, but as it was in a public inn, in a frequented street, there were too many witnesses to the contrary; and, as a military man, he has not cut a martial figure, even in the opinion of the priests. He ran off in such a hurry that he left his hat, and never missed it till he got to his hostel or inn. The facts are as I tell you, I can assure you. He began by 'coming Captain Grand over me,' or I should never have thought of trying his 'cunning in fence.' But what could I do? He talked of 'honor, and satisfaction, and his commission; he produced a military passport

There are severe punishments for regular duels on the continent, and trifling ones for roncours, so that it is best to fight it out directly; he had robbed his brother; he asked me: what could I do? With regard to other things, I will write soon, but I have been quarrelling and fooling till I can scribble no more.'

LETTER CCCCV
TO MR. HOPPER.

"Oct. 29, 1819.

"I am glad to hear of your return, but I do not know how to congratulate you—unless you think differently of Venice from what I think now, and you thought always. I am, besides, about to renew your troubles by requesting you to be judge between Mr. Edgecombe and myself in a small matter of imputed peculation and irregular accounts on the part of that phœnx of secretaries. As I knew that you had not parted friends, at the same time that I refused for my own part any judgment but yours. I offered by his choice of any person, the least scoundrel native to be found in Venice, as his own umpire; but he expressed himself so convinced of your impartiality, that I decided him. This in a few words. The papers within will explain to you the default in his accounts. You will hear his explanation, and decide, if it so please you. I shall not appeal from the decision.

"As he complained that his salary was insufficient, I determined to have his accounts examined, and the enclosed was the result. It is all in black and white with documents, and I have despatched Fletcher to explain (or rather to perple) the matter. * I have had much civility and kindness from Mr. Pavville during your journey, and I thank him accordingly.

"Your letter reached me at your departure, and displeased me very much—not that it might not be true in its statement and kind in its intention, but you have lived long enough to know how useless all such representations ever are and must be in cases where the passions are concerned. To reason with men in such a situation is like reasoning with a drunkard in his cups—the only answer you will get from him is that he is sober, and you are drunk.

"Upon that subject we will (if you like) be silent. You might only say what would distress me without answering any purpose whatever; and I have too many obligations to you to answer in the same style. I would you should not suspect that I have also that advantage over me. I hope to see you soon.

"I suppose you know that they said at Venice, that I was arrested at Bologna as a carbonari, story about, as true as their usual conversation. Moore has been here—I lodged him in my house at Venice, and went to see him daily; but I could not at that time quit La Mira entirely. You and I were not very far from meeting in Switzerland. With my best respects to Mrs. Hopper, believe me ever and truly, &c.

"P. S. Allegra is here in good health and spirits—I shall keep her with me till I go to England, which will perhaps be in a month or so. I am afraid I am not in the best of health myself; but I do not care. His friend is at Porti; we shall meet on my way back to Ravenna. The Hau- verian seems the greater rogue of the two; and if my valor does not ozone away Acres'—* Odd's flints and triggers! If it should be a rainy morn- ing and I am in disorder, there may be something for the obituary.

* Mr. Hopper, before his departure from Venice for Switzerland, had written a letter to Lord Byron, accusing him 'to have Ravenna, while I was there a whole ship's company to have injured him out to risk this enormous sum so absurdly attached to as well as his own— for the genius of a mammary passion, which could only be a source of regret to both parties.' In a second letter Mr. Hopper informed him of some report he had heard lately of Venice, which, though possibly, he said, unfounded, had much increased his anxiety respecting the consequences of the connection formed by him—Moore.
source. I do not wish to find him a rascal, if it can be avoided, and would rather think him guilty of carelessness than cheating. The case is this—can I, or shall, give him a character for honesty? It is not my intention to continue him in my service."

LETTER CCCCV.

"October 25, 1819.

You need not have made any excuses about the letter; I never said but that you might, could, should, or would have reason. I merely described my own state of inaptitude to listen to it at that time, in those circumstances. Besides, you did not speak from your own authority—but from what you said you had heard. Now my blood boils to hear an Italian speaking ill of another Italian, because, though they lie in particular, they speak truth in general by speaking ill at all—and although they know that they are trying and wishing to lie, they do not succeed, merely because they can say nothing so bad of each other, that it may not, and must not be true from the atrocity of their long-diskbased national character.

With regard to Edgecombe, you will perceive a most irregular, extravagant account, without proper documents to support it. He demanded an increase of salary, which made me suspect him; he supported an outrageous extravagance of expenditure, and did not like the dismissal of the cock; he never complained of him—as in duty bound—at the time of his robberies. I can only say, that the house expense is now under one-half of what it then was, as he himself admits. He charged for a comb eighteen francs,—the real price was eight. He charged a passage from Fusina for a person named Isamelli, who paid it herself, as she will prove, if necessary. He fancies, or asserts himself, the victim of a domestic complot against him; accounts are accounts—prices are prices—let him make out a fair detail. I am not prejudiced against him—on the contrary, I supported him against the complaints of his wife, and of his former master, at time when I could have crushed him like an enwig, and if he is a scoundrel, he is the greatest of scoundrels, an ungrateful one. The truth is, probably, that he thought I was leaving Venice, and determined to make the most of it. At present he keeps bringing in accounts after account, though he had always money in hand—as I believe you know my system was never to allow longer than a week's bills to run. Pray read him this letter—I desire nothing to be concealed against whom he may defend himself.

"Pray how is your little boy? and how are you—I shall be up in Venice very soon, and we will be bilious together. I hate the place and all that it entails.

"Yours, &c"

LETTER CCCCVI.

TO MR. HOPPER.

"October 25, 1819.

I have to thank you for your letter, and your compliment to Don Juan. I said nothing to you about it, understanding that it is a sore subject with the moral reader, and has been the cause of a great row; but I am glad you like it. I will say nothing about the shipwreck, except that I hope you think it is as nautical and technical as verse could admit in the octave measure.

The poem has not sold well, so Murray says—but the booksellers, &c., say 'yes,' so says thy worthy man. I have never seen it in print. The third canto is in advance about one hundred stanzas, but the failure of the first two has weakened my estro, and it will neither be so good as the former two, nor can we all be prejudiced. I get a little more riscato in its behalf. I understand the outcry was beyond every thing—Pretty cant for people who read Tom Jones, and Roderick Random, and the Bath Guide, and Ariosto, and Dryden, and Pope—to say nothing of Little's Poems. Of course I refer to the morality of these works, and not to any pretension of mine to compete with them in any thing but decency. I hope yours is the Paris edition, and I wish you paid the old editionprice. I have seen neither, except in the newspapers.

"Pray make my respects to Mrs. H., and take care of your little boy. All my household have the fever and ague, except Fletcher, Allogra, and myself, (as we used to say in Nottinghamshire,) and the horses, and Mutz, and Moretto. In the beginning of November, perhaps sooner, I expect to have the pleasure of seeing you. To-day I got drenched by a thunder-storm, and my horse and groom too, and his horse all bemired up to the middle in a cross-road. It was summer, at noon, and at five we were bewildered; but the lightning was sent, perhaps, to let us know that the summer was not yet over. It is queer weather for the 27th of October.

"Yours, &c"

LETTER CCCCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, October 29, 1819.

"Yours of the 15th came yesterday. I am sorry that you do not mention a large letter addressed to your care for Lady Byron, from me, at Bologna, two months ago. Pray tell me was this letter received and forwarded?

"You say nothing of the vice-consulate for the Ravennatici patron, from which is to be inferred that the thing will not be done.

"I had written about a hundred stanzas of a third canto to Don Juan, but the reception of the first two is no encouragement to you nor me to proceed.

"I had also written about six hundred lines of a poem, the Vision (or Prophecy) of Dante, the subject a view of Italy in the ages down to the present—supposing Dante to speak in his own person, previous to his death and embracing all topics in the way of prophecy, like Lycephon's Cassandra; but this and the other are both at a stand-still for the present.

"I gave Moore, who is gone to Rome, my life in MS. in seventy-eight folio sheets, brought down to 1816. But this I put into his hands for his care, as he has some other MSS. of mine—a journal kept in 1814, &c. Neither are for publication during my life, but when I am cold, you may do what you please. In the mean time, if you like to read them you may, and show them to any body you like—I care not.

"The life is memoranda and not confessions. I have left out all my loves, (except in a general way,) and many other of the most important things, (because I must not compromise other people,) so that it is like the play of Hamlet—"The part of Hamlet omitted by particular desire." But you will find many opinions, and some fun, with a detailed account of my marriage and its consequences, as true as a party concerned can make such account, for I suppose we are all prejudiced.

"I have never read over this life since it was written, so that I know not exactly what it may repeat or contain. Moore and I passed some merry days together."

"S. Lowg. Cooley."
"I probably must return to business, or in my way to America. Pray, did you get a letter for Hobhouse, who will have told you the contents? I understand that the American consuls had orders to treat with emigrants; now I want to go there. I should not make a bad South American planter, and I should take my natural daughter, Alenor, with me, and settle. I wrote, at length, to Hobhouse, to get information from Perry, who, I suppose, is the best topographer and trumpeter of the new republicans. Pray write.

"Yours, ever.

"P. S. Moore and I did nothing but laugh. He will tell you of my wherestouts, and all my proceedings at this present; they are as usual. You should not let those fellows publish false "Don Juan;" but do not put my name, because I mean to cut Roberts up like a gourd in the presence, if I continue the poem."

LETTER CCCVII.

TO MR. HOPPNER.

"October 29, 1819.

"The Ferrara story is of a piece with all the rest of the Venetian manufacture,"—you may judge: I only changed horses there since I wrote to you, after my visit in June last. "Concert," and "carry off," quotheal 'and 'girl!' I should like to know who has been carried off, except poor dear me. I have been more ravished myself than any body since the Trojan war; but as to the arrest, and its causes, one is as true as the other, and I can account for the invention of neither. I suppose it is some confusion of the tale of the Ferraretta and of Mrs. Guiccioli, and half a dozen more; but it is useless to unravel the web, when one has only to brush it away. I shall settle with Master E., who looks very blue at your in-decision, and swears that he is the best arithmetician in Europe; and so I think also, for he makes out two and two to be five.

"You may see me next week. I have a horse or two more, (five in all,) and I shall repossess myself of Lido and I will rise earlier, and we will go and shake our livers over the beach, as heretofore, if you like—and we will make the Adriatic roar again with our hatred of that now empty oyster-shell, without its pearl, the city of Venice.

"Murray sent me a letter yesterday: the imposers have published two new third cantos of Don Juan; I take the impudence of some bookguard bookseller or other therefor! Perhaps I did not make myself understood; he told me the sale had been great, twelve hundred out of fifteen hundred quarto, I believe, (which is nothing, after selling thirteen thousand of the Corsair in one day;) but that the 'best judges,' &c., had said it was very fine, and clever, and particularly good English, and poetry, and all those consolatory things, which are not, however, worth a single copy to a bookseller: and as to the author, of course I am in a d—ned passion at the bad taste of the times, and swear there is nothing like posterity, who, of course, must know more of the matter than their grandfathers. There has been an eleventh commandment to the women not to read it, and what is still more extraordinary, they seem not to have broken it. But that can be of little import to them, poor things, for the reading or non-reading a book will never "Count G. comes to Venice next week, and I am requested to consign his wife to him, which shall be done. What say of the long evenings at the Mira, or Venice, reminds me of what Curran said to Moore:—So I hear you have married a pretty woman, and a very good creature, too,—an excellent creature Pray—um!—how do you pass your evenings?" It is a devil of a question that, and perhaps as easy to answer with a wife as with emigrants. I mean to go to England in the spring, and put Mrs. Hoppner at Berne with her relations for a few months. I wish you had been here (at Venice, I mean, not the Mira) when Moore was here—were we very merry and tipsy. He hated Venice by-the-way and swore it was a sad place.

"So Madame Albizzi's death is in danger—poor woman! * * * * * * * * * Moore told me that at Geneva they had made a devil of a story of the Ferraretta;—Young lady seduced!—subsequent abandonment!—leap into the Grand Canal,—and her being in the 'hospital of fous in consequence!' I should like to know who was nearest being made 'fou,' and be d—d to them! Don't you think me in the interesting character of a very ill-used gentleman? I hope your little boy is well. Allegro is flourishing like a pomegranate blossom. "Yours, &c.

LETTER CCCIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, November 8, 1819.

"Mr. Hoppner has lent me a copy of Don Juan," Paris edition, which he tells me is read in Switzerland by clergymen and ladies, with considerable approbation. In the second canto, you must alter the forty-nine stanzas to

"'Twas twilight, and the windless day went down Over the lake of waters, like a veil Which if withheld would but disclose the form Of one whose heart was made'd not to be told Those to their hopeless eyes the gates was shown, And gringly drank o'er their worn sole And the dim deadeate deep; twelve days had Pear Been their smaller, and now Death was born.'

"I have been ill these eight days with a tertian fever caught in the country on the way back in a thunder-storm. Yesterday I had the fourth attack: the two last were very smart, the first day as well as the last being preceded by vomiting. It is the fever of the place and the season. I feel weakened, but not unwell, in the intervals, except headach and lassitude.

"Count Guiccioli has arrived in Venice, and has presented his spouse (who had preceded him two months for her health and the presciptions of Dr. Aglietti) with a paper of conditions, regulations of hours, and conduct, and morals, &c., &c., which he insist on her accepting, and she persists in refusing. I am expressly, it should seem, excluded by this treaty, as an indispensable preliminary; so that they are in high disension, and what the result may be, I know not, particularly as they are consulting friends.

"To-night, on Countess Guiccioli observed me poring over 'Don Juan,' she stumbled by mere chance on the one hundred and thirty-seven stanza of the first canto, and asked me what it meant. I told her, 'Nothing—but your husband is coming in, this moment.' As I said this in Italian with some emphasis, she started up in a fright, and said, 'Oh, my God, is he coming?' thinking it was her own, who either was or ought to have been at the theatre. You may suppose I laughed when she found out the mistake. You will be amused, as I was; it happened not three hours ago.

"I wrote to you last week, but have added no

Mr. Murray had commenced a suit against a London bookseller, for an infringement of his copyright, in publishing a pirated edition of his work. *

LETTER CCCCXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

VOSeo, Dec. 4, 1819.

"You may do as you please, but you are about a hopeless experiment." Eldon will decide against you, were it only that my name is in the record. You will also recollect that if the publication is pronounced against, on the grounds of obscenity, indecent and blasphemous, that I lose all right in my daughter's guardianship and education, in short, all paternal authority, and every thing concerning her, except her person.

It was so decided in Shelley's case, because he had written Queen Mab, &c., &c. However, you can ask the lawyers, and do as you like: I do not inhibit you trying the question; I merely state one of the consequences to me. With regard to the copyright, it is hard that you should pay for a non-entity: I will, therefore, refund it, which I can very well do, not having spent it, nor begun upon it; and so we will be quits on that score. It lies at my banker's.

"Of the Chancellor's law I am no judge; but take up Tom Jones, and read his Mrs. Waters and Molly Seagrim; or Prior's Hans Carvel and Paolo Pugnazz; Smollett's Roderick Random; or Fielding's Damon, or Stert of Lord Stratwell, and many others; Peregrine Pickle, the scene of the Beggar Girl; Johnson's London, for coarse expressions; for instance, the words * * *;" and * * *; Ameney's Bath Guide, the 'Heardst Lady Betty, beareen; ' - take up, in short, Pope, Prior, Congreve, Dryden, Fielding, Smollett, and let the council select passages, and what becomes of their copyright, if his Wat Tyler decision is to pass into a precedent? * I have nothing more to say: you must judge for yourselves.

"I wrote to you some time ago. I have had a tertian ague; my daughter Allegra has been ill also, and I have been almost obliged to run away with my newly-wed wife; but with some difficulty, and many internal struggles, I reconciled the lady with her lord, and cured the fever of the child with bark, and my own with cold water. I think of setting out for England by the Tyrol in a few days, so that I could wish you to direct your next letter to Calais. Excuse my writing in great haste and late in the morning, or night, whichever you please to call it. The third canto of Don Juan is committed, in about two hundred stanzas; very decent, I believe, but do not know, and it is useless to discuss until it be ascertained, if it may or may not be a property.

* My present determination to quit Italy was unlooked for; but I have explained the reasons in letters to my sister and Douglas Kinnaird, a week or two ago. My progress will depend upon the snows of the Tyrol, and the health of my child, who is at present quite recovered,—but I hope to get on well, and am "Yours ever and truly.

"P. S. Many thanks for your letters, to which you are not to consider this as an answer, but as an acknowledgement."

LETTER CCCXII.

TO THE COUNTESS GUICCIOLI.

"You are, and ever will be, my first thought, but at this moment, I am in a state most dreadful, not knowing which way to decide;—on the one hand, fearing that I should compromise you for ever, by my return to Ravenna, and the consequences of such a step, and, on the other, dreading that I shall lose both you and myself, and all that I have ever known or tasted of happiness, by never seeing your face, I implore you to be comforted, and to believe that I cannot cease to love you but with my life.

"I go to save you, and leave a country insupportable to me without you. Your letters to F. and myself do wrong to my motives—but you will yet see your injustice. It is not enough that I must leave you—from motives of which ere long you will be convinced—it is not enough that I must fly from Italy, with a heart deeply wounded, after having passed all my days in solitude since your departure, sick both in body and mind—but I must also have your end to your reproaches without answering and without knowing them. Farewell,—in that one word is comprised the death of my happiness."

LETTER CCCXIII.

TO THE COUNTESS GUICCIOLI.

"F. will already have told you, with her accustomed subtility, that Love has gained the victory. I could not summon up resolution enough to leave the country where you are, without, at least, once more seeing you. On yourself, perhaps, it will depend, whether I ever again shall leave you. Of the rest we shall speak when we meet. You ought, by this time, to know which is most conducing to your welfare, my presence or my absence.—For myself, I am a citizen of the world—all countries are alike to me. You have ever been, since our first acquaintance, the sole object of my thoughts. My opinion was, that the best course I could adopt, both for your peace and that of all your family, would have been to depart and go far, far away from you;—since to have been near and not approach you would have been, for me, impossible. You have however decided that I am to return to Ravenna. I shall accordingly return—and shall do—and be all that you wish. I cannot say more."

LETTER CCCXIV.

TO MR. HOPPNER.

"My Dear Hoppner,

"Partings are but bitter work at best, so that I shall not venture on a second with you. Pray make my respects to Mrs. Hoppner, and assure her of my unalterable reverence for the singular goodness of her disposition, which is not without its reward even in this world—for those who are no great believers in human virtues would discover enough in her to give them a better idea of Wilson's characters, and—what is still more difficult—of themselves, as being of the same species, however inferior in approaching its noble models. Make, too, what excuses you can for my omission of the ceremony ofleaves-taking. If we all meet again, I will make my humblest apology: if not, recollect that I wished you all well: and, if you can, forget that I have given you a great deal of trouble.

"Yours, &c., &c."

LETTER CCCXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Since I last wrote, I have changed my mind, and shall not come to England. The more I contemplate the more I dislike the place and the prospect. You may therefore address me as usual here, though you may not hear from me. I have finished the third canto of Don Juan, but the things I have read and heard discourage all farther publication—at least for the present. You may try the copy question, but you'll lose it: they try it up, and can't as usual. I should have no objection to return the price of the copyright, and have written to Mr Kinnaird by this post on the subject. Talk with him.

"I have not the patience, nor do I feel interest enough in the question, to contend with the fellows in their own slang; but I perceive Mr Blackwood's Magazine and one or two others of your missives have been hyperbolical in their praise of the work of their able printer, and like and admire Wilson, and he should not have indulged himself in such orature.

"It is overdone and defeats itself.—What would he say to the grossness without passion and the misanthropy without feeling of GilIVER'S Travels?—When he talks of lady Byron's business, he talks of what he knows nothing about and you may tell him that no one can more desire a public investigation of that affair than I do.

"I see John Moore (for Moore only who has my journal also) my memoir written up to 1816, and I gave him leave to show it to whom he pleased, but not to publish, on any account. You may read it, and you may guess what you like—not for his public opinion, but his private;—for I like the man, and care very little about his magazine. And I could wish Lady B. herself to read it, that she may have it in her power to mark any thing mistaken or mistated; as it may probably appear after my extinction, and it would be but fair she should see it,—that is to say, herself willing.

"Perhaps I may take a journey to you in the spring; but I have been ill and am indolent and indecisive, because few things interest me. These fellows first abused me for being gloomy, and now they are wrath that I am, or attempted to be, factional. I have got such a cold and headache that I can hardly see what I scribble;—the winters here are as sharp as needles. Some time ago I wrote to you rather fully about my Italian affairs; at present I can say no more except that you shall hear farther by-and-by.

"Your Blackwood accuses me of treating women harshly: it may be so, but I have been their martyr; my whole life has been sacrificed to them and by them. I mean to leave Venice in a few days, but you will address your letters here as usual. When I return elsewhere, you shall know.

LETTER CCCCXVI.
TO M. HOFFNER.

"Ravenna, Dec. 31, 1819.

I have been here this week, and was obliged to put on my armor and go the night after my arrival to the Marquis Cavalli’s, where there were between two and three hundred of the best company I have seen in Italy,—more beauty, more youth, and more diamonds among the women than have been seen these fifty years in the Sea-Sodom. — I never saw such a difference between two places of the same latitude, (or plateau,)—music, dancing, and playing, all in the same salle. The G.‘s object appeared to be to parade her foreign lover as much as possible, and, if she seemed to glory in the scandal, it was not for me to be ashamed of it. Nobody seemed surprised,—all the women, on the contrary, were, as it were, delight with the excellent example. The vice-legate, and all the other vices, were as polite as could be;—and I, who had acted on the side, was not fairly obliged,—all the MS. memoir made me feel under my arm, and look as much like a civilian as I could on so short a notice,—to say nothing of the embarrassment of a cocked hat and sword, much more formidable to me than ever it will be to the enemy.

I write in great haste—do you answer as hastily. I can understand nothing of all this; but it seems as if the G. had been presumed to be planted, and was determined to show that she was not,—plantation, in this hemisphere, being the greatest moral misfortune. But this is mere conjecture, for I know nothing about it,—except that every body are very kind to her, and not discourteous to me. Fathers, and all relations, quite agreeable.

Yours ever,

P. S. Best respects to Mrs. H.

I would send the compliments of the season; but the season itself is so little complimentary with snow and rain that I wait for sunshine."

LETTER CCCCXVII.
TO MR. MOORE.

"January 2, 1820.

My dear Moore,

"Today it is my wedding-day,

And all the folk would see,

If wife should dine at Edmonton,

And I should dine at Ware."

Or thus—

"Here’s a happy new year I but with reason,

I beg you’ll permit me to say—

When so many returns of the season

But as fast as you please of the year."

My this present writing is to direct you that, if she chooses, she may see the MS. memoir in your possession. I wish her to have fair play in all cases, even though it will not be published till after my decease. For this purpose, it were but just that Lady B. should know what is there said of her and hers, that she may have full power to remark on or respond to any part or parts, as may seem fitting to herself. This is fair dealing, I presume, in all events.

Because of the waters I saw Sea-Sodom I"

Marino Piferro.

LETTERS.

"To change the subject, are you in England? I send you an epitaph for Castlereagh.

Another for Pitt—

"With death doesn’t grapple

Erect this obelisk, sir,

Who lied in the Chapel.

Now lies in the Abbey.

The gods seem to have made me poetically this day:—

In digging up your bones, Tom Paine,

Will Cobett has done well:

You risk him on such again,

He’ll fail you to fail.

You come to him on ear again,

He’ll go with you to hell.

Pray let not these versiculi go forth with my name, except among the initiated, because my friend Hobhouse has foamed into a reformer, and I greatly fear, will subside into Newgate; since the Honorable House, according to Galigiani’s Remarks on Parliamentary Debates, are menacing a prosecution to a pamphlet of his. I shall be very sorry to hear any thing but good for him, particularly in these miserable squabbles; but these are the natural effects of taking a part in them.

For my own part, I had a sad scene since you went. Count Gu. came for his wife, and none of those consequences which Scott prophesied ensued. There was no damages, as in England, and so Scott lost his wager. But there was a great scene, for she would not, at first, go back with him—at least, she did go back with him; but he insisted, reasonably enough, that all communication should be broken off between her and me. So, finding Italy very dull, and having a fever tertiain, I packed up my valise and prepared to cross the Alps; but my daughter fell ill, and detained me."

"After her arrival at Ravenna, the Guiccioli fell ill again; and, at last her father (who had, all along, opposed the liaison most violently till now) wrote to me to say that she was in such a state that he begged me to come and see her.—and that her husband had acquiesced, in consequence of her relapse, and that he (her father) would guarantee all this, and that there would be no farther scenes in consequence between them, and that it should not be compromised in any way. I set out soon after, and have been here ever since. I found her a good deal altered, but getting better:—all this comes of reading Corinne.

The Carnival is about to begin, and I saw about two or three hundred people at the Marquis Cavalli’s the other evening, with as much youth, beauty, and diamonds among the women, as ever averaged in the like number. My appearance in waiting on the Guiccioli was considered as a thing of course. The Marquis is her uncle, and naturally considered me as her relation.

The paper is out, and so is the letter. Pray write. Address to Venice, whence the letters will be forwarded.

Yours, &c.,
B"

LETTER CCCCXVIII.
TO MR. HOFFNER.

"Ravenna, January 20, 1820.

I have not decided any thing about remaining at Ravenna. I may stay a day, a week, a year, all my life; but all this depends upon what I can neither see nor foresee. I came because I was called, and will go the moment that I perceive what may render my departure proper. My attachment has neither the blindness of the beginning, nor the microscopic accuracy of the close to such liaisons; but time and the hour must decide upon what I do. I can as yet say nothing, because I hardly know anything beyond what I have told you
BYRON'S WORKS.

"I wrote to you last post for my movables, as there is no getting a lodging with a chair or table here ready; and as I have already some things of the sort at Bologna which I had last summer there for my daughter, I have directed them to be moved; and wish the like to be done with those of Venice, that I may at least get out of the 'Albergo Imperiale,' which is imperial in all true sense of the epithet. Buonani may be paid for his poison. I forgot to say that Mr. and Mrs. Hoppner for a whole treasure of toys for Allegrely have to bear the charge; it was very kind, and we are very grateful.

"Your account of the wedding of the Governor's party is very entertaining. If you do not understand the cusomlar exceptions, I do; and it is right that a man of honor, and a woman of probity, should find it so, particularly in a place where there are not 'ten righteous.' As to nobility—in England none are strictly noble but peers, not even peers' sons, though titled by courtesy; nor knights of the garter, unless of the peerage, so that Castle-regagh himself would hardly pass through a foreign herald's ordeal till the death of his father.

"The same is a foot deep here. There is a theatre, and opera,—the Barber of Seville. Balls begin on Monday next. Pay the porter for never looking after the gate, and ship my chattels, and let me know, or let Castelli let me know how best to go on—but fee him only in proportion to his success. Perhaps we may meet in the spring yet, if you are for England. I see Hobhouse has got into a scrape, which does not please me; he should not have gone so deep among those men, without calculating the consequences. I used to think myself the most imprudent of all among my friends and acquaintances, and almost begin to doubt it.

"Yours, &c.

LETTER CCCXC.

"Ravenna, January 31, 1829.

"You would hardly have been troubled with the removal of my furniture, but there is none to be had nearer than Bologna, and I have been fain to have that of the rooms which I fitted up for my daughter there in the summer removed here. The expense will be at least as great of the land carriage, so that you are in my position, and none have gone on—but fee him only in proportion to his success. Perhaps we may meet in the spring yet, if you are for England. I see Hobhouse has got into a scrape, which does not please me; he should not have gone so deep among those men, without calculating the consequences. I used to think myself the most imprudent of all among my friends and acquaintances, and almost begin to doubt it.

"I am translating the first canto of Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, and have half done it; but these last days of the Carnival confuse and interrupt every thing.

"I have not yet sent off the cantos, and have some doubt whether they ought to be published, for they have not the spirit of the first. The outery has not frightened but it has hurt me, and I have not written you about this. It is very decent, however, and it is still at this last the best I can do for a churchman, on the score of religion; and so tell those buffoons who accuse me of attacking the Liturgy.

"I write in the greatest haste, as being the hour of the corso, and I must go and buffoon with the rest. My daughter Allegra is just gone with the Countess G., in Count G.'s coach and six, to join the cavalcade, and I must follow with all the rest of the Ravenna world. Our old cardinal is daco, and the new one not appointed yet; but the masking goes on the same, the nice-leg to be a good governor. We have had hideous frost and show, but all is mild again.

"Yours, &c.

LETTER CCCCXI.

TO MR. BANKES.

"Ravenna, February 10, 1829.

"I have room for you in the house here, as I have in Venice, if you think fit to make use of it; but do not expect to find the same gorgeous suite of tapestried halls. Neither dangerous nor tropical.

"The weather here has been dreadful—snow several feet—a fiende broke down a bridge, and flooded heaven knows how many camps; then rain came; and the earth seemed as if my little horses have a sincere till the roads become more practicable. Why did Lega give away the goat? a blockhead—I must have him again.

"Will you miss Miss Mistletoe? the Buffo Buffi of the Gran Bretagna? I heard from Moore, who is at Paris; I had previously written to him in London, but he has not yet got my letter, apparently.

"Believe me, &c.

The word here being under the seal is Inopea.

LETTER CCCCX.
neats have ever prevented your penetrating wherever you had a mind to it, and why should the snow now?—Italian snow—tie on it!—so pray come.
Titta's heart yearns for you, and mayhap for your silver broad pieces: and your playfellow, the monkey, is alone and inconsolable.

"I forget whether you admire or tolerate red hair, so that I rather dread showing you all that I have about me, and around me in this city.
Come, nevertheless,—you can pay Dante a morning visit, and I will undertake that Theodore and Honorina will be most happy to see you in the forest hard by.
We Goths, also, of Ravenna hope you will not despair of our arch-Goth, Theodoric. I have nothing to these worthies to entertain you all the fore part of the day, seeing that I have none at all myself—the lark, that rouses me from my slumbers, being an afternoon bird. But, then, all your evenings, and as much as you can give me of your nights, will be mine. Ay! and you will find me eating flesh, too, like yourself or any other cannibal, except it be upon Fridays. Then, there are more cantos (and bedazzled with) of what the courteous reader, Mr.
Saunders, calls Grub street, in my drawer, which I have a little scheme to commit to your charge for England; only I must first cut up (or cut down) two aforesaid cantos into three, because I am grown boring by now, and I proceed to let you my Mecenas, Murray, get too much for his money.
I am busy, also, with Pulci—translating—servilely translating, stanza for stanza, and line for line—two octaves every night,—the same allowance as at Venice.

"Would you call at your banker's at Bologna, and ask him for some letters lying there for me,
and burn them?—or I will—do not burn them, but bring them,—and believe me ever and very affectionately

"Yours,

BYRON.

"P. S. I have a particular wish to hear from yourself something about Cyprus, so pray recollect all that you can. Good night.

LETTER CCCXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Ravenna, February 11, 1829.

"The bull-dogs will be very agreeable. I have only those of this country, who, though good, have not been kindled, and so I shall have no occurrence of my canine fellow-citizens: thus pray send them by the readiest conveyance—perhaps best by sea.
Mr. Kineaird will discharge them, and deduct from the amount on your application or that of Captain Tyler.

"I see the good King is gone to his place.
One can't help being sorry, though blindness, and age, and infirmity are supposed to be drawbacks on broad ability; but I am not at all sure that the latter at least do not render him happier than any of his subjects.

"I have no thoughts of coming to the coronation, though I should like to see it, and though I have a right to be a puppet in it; but my division with Lady Byron, which has drawn an equinoctial line between me and mine in all other things, will operate in this also to prevent my being in the same procession.

"By Saturday's post I sent you four packets, containing cantos third and fourth. Recollect that these two cantos reckon only as one with you and me, being in fact the third canto cut into two, because I found it too long. Remember this, and don't imagine that there could be any other motive.
The whole is about two hundred and twenty-five stanzas, more or less, and a lyric of ninety-six lines so that they are no longer than the first single cantos: but the truth is, that I made the first too long, and should have cut those down also had I thought better. Instead of saying in future for so many cantos, say so many stanzas or pages: it was Jacob Tonson's way, and certainly the best; it prevents mistakes. I might have sent you a dozen cantos of forty stanzas each,—those of 'The Minstrel' (Beatie's) are no longer, and ruined you at first, if you don't take care to collect that you are not pinned down to any thing you will say in letter, and that, calculating even these two cantos as one only (which they were and are to be reckoned), you are not bound by your offer.

Act as may seem to you best, and they play at it.

"I have finished my translation of the first canto of the 'Morgante Maggiore' of Pulci, which I will transcribe and send. It is the parent, not only of Whistlercraft, but of all jocose Italian poetry.
You must put it side by side with the original Italian, because I wish the reader to judge of the fidelity: it is stanza for stanza, and often line for line, if not word for word.

"You ask me for a volume of manners, &c., on Italy. Perhaps I am in the case to know more of them than most Englishmen, because I have lived among the natives, and in parts of the country where Englishmen never resided (I speak of Pomagnia and its peculiarly). I cannot say that there are many reasons why I do not choose to treat in print on such a subject. I have lived in their houses and in the heart of their families, sometimes merely as 'satyr,' and sometimes in courtly 'aparti di cuore' of the Dama, and in neither case do I feel myself authorized in making a book of them.
Their moral is not your moral: their life is not your life: you would not understand it; it is not English, nor French, nor German, which you would all understand. The conventual education, the cavalier servitude, the habits of thought and living are so entirely different, and the difference becomes so much more striking the more you live intimately with them, that I know not how to make you compre-prehend a people who are at once temperate and profligate, serious in their characters and buffoons in their amusements, capable of impressions and passions, which are at once sudden and durable (what you find in no other nation), and who actually have no society (what we would call so), as you may see by their comedies; they have no real comedy, not even Goldoni, and that is because they have no society to draw it from.

"Their conversations are not society at all. They go to the theatre to talk, and into company to hold their tongues. The women sit in a circle, and the men gather by groups, or play at faro, or 'lotto reale,' for small sums. Their acadeic are concerts like our own, with better music and more form. Their best things are the carnival balls, and masquerades, when every body seems mad for six weeks. After their dinners and suppers they make extemporary verses and buffoon one another; but it is in a humor which you would not enter into, ye of the north.

"In their manners it is better. I should, kne something of the matter, having had a pretty general experience among their women, from the fisherman's wife up to the Nobil Dama, whom I serve.
Their system has its rules, and its fidelities, and to be reduced to a kind of discipline or game at hearts, which admits few deviations, unless you wish to lose it. They are extremely tenacious, and jealous as furies, not permitting their lovers to marry if they think keeping them always close to them in public as private, whenever they can. In short, they transfer marriage to adultery, and strike the out.
of that common way, that common way of whelming their intentions is to marry for their parents, and love for themselves
They exact fidelity from a lover as a debt of honor while they pay the husband as a tradesman, that is not at all. You hear a person's character, male or female canvassed, not as depending on their conduct to their husbands or wives, but to their mistresses or lover. If I wrote a quart, I don't know that I could do more than amplify what I have here noted. It is to be observed that while they do all this, the greatest outward respect is to be paid to the husbands, not only by the ladies, but by their Serventiti—particularly if the husband serves no one himself (which is not often the case, however); so that you would often suppose them relations—the Serventi making the figure of one adopted into the family. Sometimes the ladies runu a little restive and elope, or divide, or make a scene; but this is at starting, generally, when they know no better, or when they fall in love with a forager, or some such anomaly—and jas always reckoned unnecessary and extravagant.

"You inquire after Dante's Prophecy: I have not done more than six hundred lines, but will vatici- nal at leisure.

"Of the bust I know nothing. No cameos or seals are to be cut here or elsewhere that I know of, in any good style. Hobhouse should write him- self to Thorwaldsen: the bust was made and paid for three years ago.

"Pray tell Mrs. Leigh to request Lady Byron to urge forward the transfer from the funds. I wrote to Lady Byron on business this post, addressed to the 'sure of Mr. D. Kinnaird.'

LETTER CCCXXXII.

TO MR. BANKES.

"Ravenna, February 26, 1820.

"Pulci and I are waiting for you with impatience, but I suppose we must give way to the attraction of the Bolognese galleries for a time. I know nothing of pictures myself, and care almost as little; but to me there are none like the Venetian—above all, Giorgiicci. I remember well his judgment of Sol- omon in the Mariscalchi in Bologna. The real mother is beautiful, exquisitely beautiful. Buy her, by all means, if you can, and take her home with you; put her in safety—for be assured there are troublous times brewing for Italy; and as I never could keep out of a row in my life, it will be my fate, I dare say, to be over head and ears in it; but no matter, these are the stronger reasons for coming to see me.

"I have more of Scott's novels (for surely they are Scott's) since we met, and am more and more delighted. I think that I even prefer them to his poetry, which (by-the-way) I read for the first time in my life in your rooms in Trinity college.

"There are some curious commentaries on Dante preserved here, which you should see. Believe me ever faithfully and most affectionately,

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCXXXIV.

"Ravenna, March 1, 1820.

"I sent you by last post the translation of the first canto of the Morgante Maggiore, and wish you to ask Rose about the word 'shergo,' i.e., 'nabgero,' which I have translated cuirass. I suspect that it means helmet also. Now, if so, which of the senses is best accordant with the text? I have adopted cuirass, but will be amiable to reasons. Of the natives, say one say, and some t'other; but they are no great Tuscan in Romagna. However, I will ask Sgricci (the famous improvisatore) to-morrow, who is a native of Arezzo. The Countess Guiccioli who is reckoned a very cultivated young lady, and the dictionary, say cuirass. I have written cuirass but helmet runs in my head nevertheless—and will run in verse very well, whil is the principal point. I will ask the Sposa Spina Spinelli, to the florid time bride of Count Gabriel Rusponi, just imported from Florence, and get the sense out of some- body.

"I have just been visiting the new cardinal, who arrived the day before yesterday in legation. He seems a good old gentleman, pious and simple, and not quite like his predecessor, who was a bon vivant, in the worldly sense of the words.

"Enclosed is a letter which I received some time ago from Dallas. It will explain itself. I have not answered it. This comes of doing people good. At one time or another (including copyrights) this person has had about fourteen hundred pounds or my money, and he writes what he calls a posthume- nous work about me, and a scrubby letter accusing me of treating him ill, when I never did any such thing. It is true that I left off letter-writing, as I have done with almost every body else; but I can't see how they can accuse me.

"I look upon his epistle as the consequence of my not sending him another hundred pounds, which he wrote to me for about two years ago, and which I cannot, properly to write, having had his share, me thought, of what I could dispone upon others.

"In your last you ask me after my articles of domestic wants: I believe they are as usual; the bull-dogs, magnesia, soda-powders, tooth-powders, brushes, and every thing of the kind which are here unattainable. You still ask me to return to Eng- land: alas! to what purpose? You do not know what you are asking. I am sure you would not do better if you lectured on the Farnese, the great house, for some day or other (if I live), sooner or later; but it will not be for pleasure, nor can it end in good. You inquire after my health and spirits in large letters: my health can't be very bad, for I cured myself of a sharp tertian ague, in three weeks, with cold water, which had held my stoutest gend- dolier for months, notwithstanding all the bark of the apothecary,—a circumstance which surprised Dr. Aglietti, who said it was a proof of great stami- na, particularly in so epidemic a season. I did it out of dislike to the taste of bark (which I can't bear), and succeeded, contrary to the prophecies of every body by simply taking nothing at all. As to spirals, the man who used to keep a shop is now pretty well, low, like other people's, I suppose, and depending upon cir- cumstances.

"Pray send me W. Scott's new novels. What are their names and characters? I read some of his former ones, at least once a day, for an hour or so. The last are too hurried: he forgets Rav- ven's wood's name, and calls him Edgar and then Nor- man; and Girdle, the cooper, is styled how Gilbert, and now John, and he don't make enough of Mon- trose; but Dalgetty is excellent, and so is Lucy Ashton, and the b—h her mother. What is Iean- hoe? and what do you call his other? are there two? Pray make him write at least two a year: I like no reading so well.

"The editor of the Bologna Telegraph has sent me a paper-with extracts from Mr. Mulock's (his name always make me of Muley Moloch of Mor-occo) 'Atheism answered,' in which there is a long eulogium of my poetry, and a great 'compati- mento' for my misery. I never could understand what they mean by accusing me of irreligion. However, there is a gentleman seems to be my great admirer, so I take what he says in good part, as he evidently intends kindness, to which I can't accuse myself of being invincible.

LETTER CCCXXV

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, March 5, 1820.

"In case, in your country, you should not readily lay hands on the Morgante Maggiore, I send you the original text of the first canto, to correspond with the translation which I sent you a few days ago. It is from the Naples edition in quarto of 1782,—dated Florence, however, by a trick of the trade, which you, as one of the allied sovereigns of the profession, will perfectly understand without any further spiegazione.

"It is strange that here nobody understands the real scientific meaning of 'spergo,' or 'sperbergo,'* an old Tuscan word, which I have rendered curiass, (but am not sure it is not helmet.) I have asked at least twenty people, learned and ignorant, male and female, including poets, and officers civil and military. The dictionary says curiass, but gives no authority; and a female friend of mine says positively curiass, which makes me doubt the fact still more than before. Gignemune says, 'bonnet de fer' (which, by an indirect, beneficial decision of a Frenchman, so that I can't believe him: and what between the dictionary, the Italian woman, and the Frenchman, there's no trusting to a word they say. The context too, which should decide, admits equally of either meaning, as you will perceive. Ask Ross. Hobhouse, Merivale, and Foscolo, and vote with the majority. Is Frere a good Tuscan? if he be, bother him too. I have tried, you see, to be as accurate as I well could. This is my third or fourth letter, or packet, within the last twenty days."

LETTER CCCXXXVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, March 14, 1820.

"Enclosed is Dante's Prophecy—Vision—or what not. Where I have left more than one reading, (which I have done often,) you may adopt that which Gifford, Frere, Rose, and Hobhouse, and others of your Utian Senate think the best. The preface will explain all that is explicable. These are but the first four cantos: if approved, I will go on.

"Pray mind in printing: and let some good Italian scholar, or the Italian quotations.

"Four days ago I was overturned in an open carriage, between the river and a steep bank,—wheels dashed to pieces, slight bruises, narrow escape, and all that: but no harm done, though coachman, footman, horses, and vehicle were all mixed together like macaroni. It was owing to bad driving, as I say; but the coachman swears to a start on the part of the horses. We went against a post on the verge of a steep bank, and capsized. I usually go out of the town in a carriage, and meet the saddle horses at the bridge; it was in going there that we bogged; but I got my ride, as usual, after the accident. They say here it was all owing to St. Antonio of Padua (serious, I assure you,) who does thirteen miracles a day,—that worse did not come of it. I have no objection to this being his fourteen to the four-and-twenty hours. He presides over overthrown coaches and escapes therefore, it seems; and they dedicate, pictures, &c., to him, as the sailors once did to Neptune, after 'the high Roman fashion.'

"Yours, in Love."

* See Note, p. 277.

LETTER CCCXXXVII.

"Ravenna, March 9, 1820.

"Last post I sent you, 'The Vision of Dante,'—first four cantos. Enclosed you will find line for line, in third rhyme (terza rima,*) of which your British blackguard reader as yet understands no thing, Fanny of Rimini. You know that she was born here, and married, and slain, from Cary, Boyd and such people. I have done it into croupy English, line for line, and rhyme for rhyme, to try the possibility. You had best append it to the poems already sent by last three posts. I shall not allow you to play the tricks you did last year, with the prose you post-scribed to Malephra, which I sent to you not to be published, if not in a periodical paper,—and there you tacked it, without a word of explanation. If this is published, publish it with the original, and together with the Pulci translation, or the Dante imitation. I suppose you have both by now, and the Juan long before.

LETTER CCCXXXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, March 19, 1820.

"I have received your letter of the 7th. Besides the four packet you have already received, I have sent the Pulci a few days after, and since (a few days ago) the first four cantos of Dante's Prophecy, (the best thing I ever wrote, if it be not unintelligible,) and by last post a literal translation, word for word (versed like the original) of the episode of Francesca of Rimini. I want you to think of the new Juans, and the translations, and the Vision. They are all things that are, or ought to be, very different from one another.

"If you choose to make a print from the Venetian, you may: but she don't correspond at all to the character you mean her to represent. On the contrary, the Contessa G. does (except that she is fair), and is much prettier than the Fornariata; but I have no picture of her except a miniature, which is very ill done; and, besides, it would not be proper, on any account whatever, to make such a use of it, even if you had a copy.

"Recollect that the two new cantos only count with us for one. You may put the Pulci and Dante together: perhaps that were best. So you have put your name to Juan after all your panic. You are a rare fellow,—but I now put myself in a passion to continue my prose.

"I have caused H. to write to Thorwaldsen. Pray be careful in sending my daughter's picture—I mean, that it be not hurt in the carriage, for it is a journey rather long and jolting."

LETTER CCCXXXIX.

"Ravenna, March 29, 1820.

"Enclosed is a 'Screech of Doctrine' for you, of which I will trouble you to acknowledge the receipt by next post. Mr. Hobhouse must have the correction of it for the press. You may show it first to whom you please.

"I wish to know what became of my two epistles from St. Paul, (translated from the Armenian three years ago and more,) and of the letter to Roberts of last autumn, which you never attended to? There are two packets with this.

"P. S. I have some thoughts of publishing the Hints from Horace,' written ten years ago—if Hobhouse can rummage out of my papers left at his father's,—with some omissions and alterations previously to be made when I see the proofs."

LETTER CCCCCXX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, March 29, 1820.

"Hereewith you will receive a note (enclosed) on Pope, which you will find tally with a part of the text of last post. I have at last lost all patience with the atrocious cand and nonsense about Pope, with which our present * * * are overflowing, and am determined to make such head against it as an individual can, by prose or verse; and I will at least do it with good will. There is no bearing it any longer: and if it goes on, it will destroy what little good writing or taste remains among us. I hope there are still a few men of taste to second me; but if not, I will battle alone, convinced that it is in the best cause of English literature.

"I have sent you so many packets, verse and prose, lately, that you will be tired of the postalage, if not of the perusal. I want to answer some parts of your last letter, but I have not time, for I must 'boast and saddle,' as my Captain Craighnicht (an officer of the old Napoleon Italian army) is in waiting, and my groom and stall to boot.

"You have given me a screech of metaphor and what not about Pulci, and mannerisms, 'going without clothes,' like our Saxon ancestors.' Now, the Saxons did not go without clothes; and, in the next place, they are not my ancestors, nor yours either; for mine were Norman, and yours, I take it by your name, were Guel. And, in the next, I differ from you about the 'refinement' which has banished the comedies of Congreve. Are not the comedies of Sheridan nated to the thinnest houses? I know (as ex-commintes) that 'The School for Scandal' was the worst stock-piece upon record. I also know that Congreve gave up writing because Mrs. Centlivre's balderdash drove his comedies off. So it is not decency, but stupidity, that does all this; for Sheridan is as decdant a writer as need be, and Congreve no worse than Mrs. Centlivre, of whom Wilkes (the actor) said, 'not only her play would be damned, but she too.' He alluded to 'A Bold Stroke for a Wife.' But last, and most to the purpose, Pulci is not an indecent writer—at least in his first canto, as you will have perceived by this time.

"You talk of refinement—are you all more moral? are you so moral? No such thing. I know what the world is in England, by my own proper experience of the best of it—at least of the loviest; and I have described it everywhere as it is to be found in all places.

"But to return. I should like to see the proofs of mine answer, because there will be something to omit or to alter. But pray let it be carefully printed. When convenient let me have an answer.

"Yours,"

LETTER CCCCCXXI.

TO MR. HOPPNER.

"Ravenna, March 31, 1820.

"Ravenna continues much the same as I described t Conversazioni all Lent, and much better ones than any at Venice. There are small games of hazard, that is, faro, where nobody can point more than a shilling or two;—other card-tables, and as much talk and coffee as you please. Every body does and says what they please; and I do not recollect any disagreeable events, except being three times falsely accused of friction, and once being robbed of six sixpences by a nobleman of the city, & Count. I did not suspect the illustrious de Luquen; but the Countess V. & the Marquis I. * * * told me of it directly, and also that I was a way he had, of fleching money when he saw it before him; but I did not az him fas the cash, but contended myself with telling him that if he did it again, I should anticipate the aw.

"There is to be a theatre in April and is fair, and an opera, and another opera in June, besides the fine weather of nature's giving, and the rides in the Forest of Pine. With my respect to Mrs. H oppner, believe me ever, & Byron.

"P. S. Could you give me an item of what book's remain at Venice? I don't want them, but want to know whether the few that are not here are there, and were not lost by the way. I hope and trust you got all your wares safe, and that it is drinkable. Allegra is pleasant, I think but as abstain as a mule, and as ravenous as a vulture; health good, to judge of the complexion—temper tolerable but for vanity and pertinacity. She thinks herself hand some and will do as she pleases."

LETTER CCCCCXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, April 9, 1820.

"In the name of all the devils in the printing office, why don't you write to acknowledge the receipt of the second, third, and fourth packets, viz., the Pulci translation and original, the Danteies, the Observations on, &c.? You forgot that you keep me in hot water till I know whether they are arrived, or if I must have the box of recopying.

"Have you got the cream of translations, Francesca of Rimini, from the Inferno? Why, I have sent you a warehouse of trash within the last month, and you have no sort of feeling about you: a pastry-cook would have had twice the gratitude, and thanked me least. C for the quantity, even of the Lutheran creed, must go and be civil. And there will be a circle, and a faro-table, (for shillings, that is; they don't allow high play,) and all the beauty, nobility, and sanctity of Ravenna present. The cardinal himself is a very good-natured little fellow bishop of Muda, and legate here,—a decent believer in all the doctrines of the church. He has kept his housekeeper these forty years. * * *, but is reckoned a pious man, and a moral liver.

"I am not quite sure that I won't be among you this autumn, for I find that business don't go on—what with trustees and lawyers—as it should do 'with all deliberate speed.' They differ about in vestments in Ireland.

"Between the devil and deep sea, Between the lawyer and trustor,

I am puzzled; and so much time is lost by my not being upon the spot, what with answers, demurs rejoinders, that it may be I must come and look to it; for one says do, and other don't, so that I know not which way to turn: but perhaps they can manage without me.

LETTERS.

P. S. I have begun a tragedy on the subject of Marino Faliero, the Doge of Venice; but you shan't see it these six years, if you don't acknowledge my packets with more quickness and precision. Always write, if but a line, by return of post, when anything arrives, which is not a mere letter. Address direct to Ravenna; it saves a week's time, and much postage.

LETTER CCCXXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, April 18, 1809.

Post after post arrives without bringing any acknowledgment from you of the different packets (excepting the first) which I have sent within the last two months, all of which ought to be arrived long ere now; and as they were announced in other letters, you ought at least to say whether they are come or not. You are not expected to write frequent or long letters, as your time is much occupied; but when parcels that have cost some pains in being collected, prepared, and carried to the post-office, are sent to you, I should at least be put out of suspense, by the immediate acknowledgment, per return of post, addressed directly to Ravenna. I am naturally—knowing what continental posts are—anxious to hear that they are arrived: especially as I loath the task of copying so much, that if there was a human being that could copy my blotted MSS., he should have all they can ever bring for his trouble. All I desire is two lines, to say, such a day I received such a packet. There are at least six unacknowledged. This is neither kind nor courteous.

I have, besides, another reason for desiring you to be speedy, which is, that there is that brewing in Italy, which will speedily cut off all security of communication, and set all your Anglo-travellers flying in every direction, with their usual fortitude in foreign tumults. The Spanish and French affairs have set the Italians in a ferment; and no wonder: they have been too long trampled on. This will make a sad scene for your exquisite traveler, but not for the resident, who naturally wishes a people to redress itself. I shall, if permitted by the natives, remain to see what will come of it, and perhaps to take a turn with them, like Dugald Dalgety and his horse, in case of business; for I shall think it by far the most interesting spectacle and moment in existence, to see the Italians send the barbarians of all nations back to their own dens. I have lived long enough among them to feel more for them as a nation than for any other people in existence. But they want union, and they want principle; and I doubt their success. However, they will try, probably, and if they do, it will be a good cause. No Italian can hate an Austrian more than I do: unless it be the English, the Austrians are second to me the most obnoxious race under the sky.

But I doubt if anything be done, it won't be so quietly as in Spain. To be sure, revolutions are not to be made with rose water, where there are foreigners as masters.

Write while you can; for it is but the toss up of a pail that there will not be a row that will somewhat retard the mail by-and-by.

Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCXXXIV.

"Ravenna, April 18, 1809.

"I have caused you to write to Siri and Wilhelm to send with Vinerza, in a boat, the camp-beds and words left in thar care when I quitted Venice. There are also several pounds of Mantow's best pow-der in a Japan case; but unless I felt sure of getting it away from V. without seizure, I won't have it ventured. I can get it here, by means of an acquaintance in the Austrians, who has offered to get it ashore for me; but should like to be certificated of its safety in leaving Venice. I would not lose it for its weight in gold; there is none such in Italy, as I take it to be.

"I wrote you a week or so ago, and hope you are in good plight and spirits. Sir Humphrey Davy is here, and was last night at the cardinal's. As I had been there last Sunday, and yesterday was warm, I did not go, which I should have done, if I had thought of meeting the man of chemistry. He called this morning, and I shall go in search of him at Corso time. I believe to-day, being Monday, there is no great conversations, and only the family one at the Marchese Cavalli's, where I go as a relation sometimes, so that, unless he stays a day or two, we should hardly meet in public.

"The theatre is to open in May for the fair, if there is not another. And all Italy by that time, the Spanish business has set them all a constituting, and what will be the end no one knows—it is also necessary thereunto to have a beginning.

"Yours, &c."

"P. S. My benediction to Mrs. Hoppner. How is your little boy? Allegro is growing, and has in creased in good looks and obstinacy."

LETTER CCCXXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, April 28, 1809.

"The proofs don't contain the lost stanzas of canto second, but end abruptly with the one hundred and fifth stanza.

"I told you, a month ago, that the new cantos were not good, and I also told you a reason. Recollect, I do not oblige you to publish them; you may suppress them, if you like, but I can alter nothing. I have erased the six stanzas about those two impostors, * * * (which I suppose, will give you the great pleasure,) but I can do no more. I can neither recast, nor replace; but I give you leave to put it all into the fire, if you like, or not to publish, and I think that's sufficient.

"I told you that I wrote on with no good-will that I had been, not frightened, but hurt by the outcry, and, besides, that when I wrote last November, I was ill in body, and in very great distress of mind about some private things of my own; but you would have it: so I sent it to you, and to make it lighter, cut it in two—but I can't piece it together again. I can't cobble: I must either make a spoon or spoil a horn,—and there's an end; for there's no remold; but I leave you free will to suppress the whole, if you like it.

"About the Margante Maggiore, I won't have a line omitted. It may circulate, or it may not; but all the criticism on earth shan't touch a line, unless it be because it is badly translated. Now you say, and I say, and others say, that the translation is a good one; and so it shall go to press as it is. Pulci must answer for his own irreligion: I answer for the translation on.

"Pray let Mr. Hobhouse look to the Italian next time in the proof's; this time, while I am scribbling to you, they are corrected by one who passes for the prettiest woman in Romagna, and even the Marche's, as far as Ancona, be the other who she may.

"I am glad you like my answer to your inquiries.

LETTER CCCCCXVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"From your not having written again, an intention which your letter of the 7th ultimo indicated, I have to presume that the 'Prophecy of Dante' has not been found more worthy than its predecessors in the eyes of your illustrious synod. In that case, I should not have been in such perplexity as to repeat to you, that you are not to consider yourself as bound or pledged to publish any thing because it is mine, but always to act according to your own views, or opinions, or those of your friends; and to be sure that you in no degree offend me by 'declining the article,' to use a technical phrase. The prose observations on John Wilson's attack, I do not intend for publication at this time; and I send a copy of verses to Mr. Kinnard, (they were written last year on crossing the río,) which must not be published either. I mention this, because it is probable he may give you a copy. Pray recollect this, as they are mere verses of society, and written upon private things and persons. Moreover, I cannot consent to any mutilations or omissions of Pulci: the original has been ever free from such in Italy, the capital of Christianity, and the translation must be so in England, too; and I do think it strange that they should have allowed such freedom for many centuries to the Morante, while the other day they confiscated the whole translation of the fourth canto of Childe Harold, and have persecuted Leoni, the translator—so he writes me, and so I could have told him, had he consulted me before its publication. This shows how much more politics interest men in these parts than religion.

Half a dozen invectives against tyrannic confrat Childe Harold in a month; and eight and twenty cantos of quizzing monks and knights, and church government, are let loose for centuries. I copy Leoni's account.

"Nin suoccrerà forse che la mia versione del 4° canto del Childe Harold fu confiscata in ogni parte: ed io stesso ho dovuto soffrire vessazioni altrettanto ridicole quanto illiberali, ad arte che alcuni versi fossero esclusi dalla censura. Ma siccome il divieto non fa d'ordine che accresca la curiosità così quel carme sull'Italia è ricercato più che mai, e penso di farlo ristampare in Inghilterra senza nulla escludere. Seiaggurata condizione di questa mia patria! se non si può chiamarla non terra così avvilita dalla fortuna, dagli uomini, da se medesima.

"Rose will translate this to you. Has he had his letter? I enclose it to you monthly ago.

"This intended piece of publication I shall disuse him from, or he may chance to see the inside of St. Angelo's. The last sentence of his letter is the common and pathetic sentiment of all his coun-

"Sir Humphrey Davy was here last fortnight, and I was in his company in the house of a very pretty Italian lady of rank, who, by displaying her learning in a manner of the greatest gaiety, and more, describing his fourteenth ascension of Mount Vesuvius, asked 'if there was not a similar volcano in Ireland.' My only notion of an Irish volcano consisted of the lake of Killarney, which I naturally conceived her to mean; but on second thoughts I divined that she alluded to Iseland and to Hecla—and so it proved, though she sustained her volcanic topography for some time with all the amiable pertinacity of the feminine kind.' She soon after turned to me, and asked me various questions about Sir Humphrey's philosophy, and I explained as well at an oracle his skill in gasen safety lamps, and ungluing the Pompeian MSS. Mum? said she. 'A great chemist, quoth I. 'What can he do?' repeated the lady. 'Almost any thing,' said I. 'Oh, then, mio caro, do pray beg him to give me something to dye my eyebrows black. I have tried a thousand things, and the colors all come off; and besides, they don't grow; can't he invent something to make them grow? All this with the greatest earnestness; and what you will be surprised at, she is neither ignorant nor a fool, but really well educated and clever. But they speak like children, when first out of their convents; and, after all, this is better than an English blue-stocking.

'I did not tell Sir Humphrey of this last piece of philosophy, not knowing how he might take it—Davy was much taken with Ravena, and the primitive Italianism of the people, who are unused to foreigners: but he only staid a day.

'Send me Scott's novels and some news.

'P. S. I have begun and advanced into the second act of a tragedy on the subject of the Doge's conspiracy, (i.e. the story of Marino Faliero;) but my present feeling is so little encouraging on such matters that I begin to think I have mined my talent out, and proceed in no great phantasy of finding a new vein.

'P. S. I sometimes think (if the Italians don't rise) of coming over to England in the autumn after the coronation, (at which I would not appear on account of my family schism,) but as yet I can decide nothing. The place must be a great deal changed since I left it, now more than four years ago.'

LETTER CCCXXXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

'Ravena, May 20, 1829.

Murray, my dear, make my respects to Thomas Campbell,* and tell him from me, with faith and friendship, three things that he must right in his poems: Firstly, he says Anstey's Bath Guide characters are taken from Smollett. 'Tis impossible:—the Guide was published in 1766, and Humphrey Clinker in 1771—duhumble, 'tis Smollett who has taken from Anstey. Secondly, he does not know to whom Cowper alludes when he says that there was one who 'built a church to God, and then blasphemed his name;' it was 'Deo erexit Voltaire,' to whom that maniac visited priest and cobbled alludes—Thirdly, he misquotes and spoils a passage from Shakespeare, 'to gild refined gold, to paint the lily,' &c.; for lily he puts rose, and bedevils in more words than one the whole quotation.

'Now, Tom is a fine fellow; but he should be correct: for the first is an injustice, (to Anstey), the second an ignorance, and the third a blunder. Tell him all this, and let him take it in good part; for I might have rambled it into a review and rowed him—instead of which, I act like a Christian.

'Yours, &c.'

LETTER CCCXXXVIII.

'Ravena, May 20, 1829.

'First and foremost, you must forward my letter to Moore dated 2d January, which I said you might or sn, but desired you to forward. Now, you should really not forget these little things, because they do mischief among friends. You are an excellent man, a great man, and live among great men, but do pray recollect your absent friends and authors.

'In the first place, your pockets; then a letter from Kinnaird, on the most urgent business, an other from Moore, about a communication to Lady Byron of importance; a fourth from the mother of Algeiro; and Sir John, at Ravenna, the Contessa G is on the eve of being divorced.—But the Italian public are on our side, particularly the women,—and the men also, because they say that he had no business to take the business up now after a year of toleration. All her relations (who are numerous, high in rank and powerful) are furious against him for his conduct. I am warned to be on my guard, as he is very capable of employing sicarii—this is Latin as well as Italian, so you can understand it; but I have arms, and don't mind them, thinking that I could pepper his ragamuffins, if they don't come unawares, and that if they do, one may as well end that way as another; and it would besides serve you as an advertisement.

'May may escape from row or gun, &c.,

But he who takes women, cassa, woman, &c.'

'Yours.'

'P. S. I have looked over the press, but heaven knows how. Think what I have on hand, and the post going out to-morrow. Do you remember the epitaph on Voltaire?

'Oh! loft the spoliator

Of the world which is spoliator.'

The original is in Grimm and Diderot, &c., &c.

LETTER CCCXXXIX.

TO MR. Mook.

'Ravena, May 24, 1829.

'I wrote to you a few days ago. There is also a letter of January last for you at Murray's which will explain to you why I am here. Murray ought to have forwarded it; I conclude you have an epistle from a countrywoman of yours at Paris, which has moved my entrails. You will have the goodness, perhaps, to inquire into the truth of her story, and I will help her as far as I can,—though not in the useless way she proposes. Her letter is evidently unstudied, and so natural, that he orthography is also in a state of nature.

'Here is a poor creature, ill and solituary, who thinks, as a last resource, of translating you or me into French! Was there ever such a notion? It seems to me the consummation of despair. Pray inquire, and let me know, and, if you could draw a bill on me here for a few hundred francs, at your banker's I will duly honor it,—that is, if she is not an impostor. If not, let me know, that I may get something remitted by my banker Longhi, of Bologna, for I have no correspondence, myself, at Paris; but tell her not to translate—If she does, it will be the height of ingratitude.

'I had a letter (not of the same kind, but in French and flattery) from Madame Sophie Gail, of Paris, whom I take to be the spouse of a Galo-Greek of that name. Who is she? and how came she to take an interest in my poetrie or its author? If you know her, tell her, with my compliments, that, as I only read French, I have not answered her letter; but would have done so in Italian, if I had not thought it would look like an affectation. I have just been scolding my monkey for tearing the seal of her letter, and spoiling a mock book, in which I put rose leaves; I had a civet-cat the other day, too; but it run away.
after watching my monkey's cheek, and I am in search of it still. It was the fiercest beast I ever saw, and like * * * in the face and manner.

"I have a world of things to say: but as they are not come to a d'ouvement, I don't care to begin their history till it is wound up. After you went you had a fever, but got well again without bark. Sir Humphrey Davy was here the other day, and liked Ravenna very much. He will tell you any thing you may wish to know about the place and your humble servitor.

"Your apprehensions (arising from Scott's) were unfounded. There are no damages in this country, but there will probably be a separation between them, as her family, in the true sense, is a principal, by its connection, and very much against him, for the whole of his conduct;—and he is old and obstinate, and she is young and a woman, determined to sacrifice every thing to her affections. I have given her the best advice, viz., to stay with him,—pointing out the state of a separated woman, (for the priests won't let lovers live openly together, unless the husband sanctions it,) and making the most exquisite moral reflection on all but to no avail. She says, "I will not live with him, if he will let you remain with me. It is hard that I should be the only woman in Rome who is not to have Amico; but, if not, I will not live with him; and as for the consequences, love, &c., &c., &c.—you know how females reason on such occasions.

"He says he has let it go on, till he can do no longer. But he wants her to stay and dismiss me; for he doesn't like to pay her dowry and to make an alimony. Her relations are rather for the separation, as they detest him—indeed, so does every body. The populace and the women are, as usual, all for those who are in the wrong, viz., the lad and her lover. I should have respected, but honor and an erysipelas which has attacked her, prevent me,—to say nothing of love, for I love her most entirely, though not enough to persuade her to sacrifice every thing to a frenzy. I 'see how it will end; she will be the sixteenth Mrs. Shullerton.'

"My paper is finished, and so must this letter.

"Yours ever,

B.

P.S. I regret that you have not completed the Italian Fudges. Pray, how come you to be still in Paris? Murray has four or five things of mine in hand—the new Don Juan, which his back-shop synd don't admire;—a translation of the first canto of P us, Maronge Maggiore, excellent;—a short litto from Dante, not so much approved;—the Prophecy of Dante, very grand and worthy, &c., &c., &c.—a furious prose answer to Blackwood's Observations on Don Juan, with a savage Defence of Pope—likely to make a row. The opinions above I quote from Murray and his Utican senate;—you will form your own, when you see the things.

"You will have no great chance of seeing me for I begin to think I must finish in Italy. But, if you come my way, you shall have a tureen of macaroni. Pray tell me about yourself and your intents.

"My trustees are going to lend Earl Blessington sixty thousand pounds (at six per cent.) on a Dublin mortgage. Only think of my becoming an Irish absentee.

LETTER CCCCXL.

"Ravenna, May 26, 1829.

"A German named Ruppseins has sent me, heaven knows why, several Deutsche Gazettes, of all which I understand neither word nor letter. I have sent you the enclosed to beg you to translate to me some remarks, which appear to be Goethe's upon Manfred!—and if I may judge by two notes of admiration (generally put after something ridiculous by us), and the word 'hypocriten,' are any thing but favorable. I shall regret this, for I should have been one of Goethe's sieve-proof; but I don't alter my opinion of him, even though he should be savage.

"Will you excuse this trouble, and do me this favor?—neat-minded, written nothing, of no literary proof—having had good and evil said in most modern languages.

"Believe me, &c.

[LETTER CCCCXL]

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, June 3, 1829.

"I have received a Parisian letter from W. W., which I prefer answering through you, if that worthy be still at Paris, and, as he says, an occasional visitor of yours. In November last he wrote to me a well-reasoned letter, signed with the names of his own, his belief that a reunion might be effected between Lady B. and myself. To this I answered as usual; and he sent me a second letter, repeating his notions, which letter I have never answered, and am, to this day, a thousand miles from the thought of. He now writes as if he believed that he had offended me, by touching on the topic; and I wish you to assure him that I am not at all so,—but on the contrary, obliged by his good-nature.

"At the same time acquaint him the thing is impossible. You know this, as well as I,—and there let it end.

"I believe that I showed you his epistle in autumn last. He asks me if I have heard of my 'laureate' at Paris,—somebody who has written a most sangunary Epitre against me; but whether in French, or Dutch, or on what score, I know not, and he don't say, except that (for my satisfaction) he says it is the best thing in the fellow's volume. If there is any thing of the kind that I ought to know, you will doubtless tell me. I suppose it to be something of the usual sort:—he says, he don't remember the author's name.

"I wrote to you some ten days ago, and expect an answer at your leisure.

"The separation business still continues, and all the world are implicated, including priests and cardinals. The public opinion is furious against him, because he ought to have cut the matter short at first, and not waited twelve months to begin. He has been trying at evidence, but can get none sufficient; for what would make fifty divorces in England won't do here—there must be the most decided proofs.

"It is the first cause of the kind attempted in Ravenna for these two hundred years; for, though they often separate, they assign a different motive. You know that the continental incontinent are more delicate than the English, and don't like proclaiming their doting in a court, even when no body doubts it.

"All her relations are furious against him. The father has challenged him—a superbulous valor, for he don't fight, though suspected of two assassinations—one of the famous Monzoni of Forli. Warning was given me not to take such long rides in the Pine Forest without being on my guard; so I take my stiletto and a pair of pistols in my pocket during my daily drives.

"I won't stir from this place till the matter is settled one way or the other. She is as femininely firm as possible; and the opinion is so much against him, that the advocates decline to undertake his cause, because they say that he is either a fool or a LETTER CCCXLII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Bavenna, June 7, 1829.

'Enclosed is something which will interest you, to wit, the opinion of the greatest man of Germany perhaps of Europe—upon one of the great men of your advertisements (all 'famous hands,' as Jacob Tomson used to say of his ragamuffins)—in short, a critique of Goethe's upon Manfred. There is the original, an English translation, and an Italian one; keep them all in your archives, for the opinions of such as Goethe, whether favorable or not, are always interesting—and this is more so, as favorable. His Faust I never read, for I don't know German; but Matthew Monk Lewis in 1816, at Coligny, translated most of it to me rise voce, and I was naturally much struck with it; but it was the Steinbach and the Jungfrau, and something else, much more than Faustus, that made me write Manfred. The first scene, however, and that of Faustus, are very similar. Acknowledge this letter. "Yours ever,

"P. S. I have received Ivanhoe—good. Pray send me some tooth-powder and tincture of myrrh, by Waite, &c., Ricciardetto should have been translated literally, or not at all. As to puffing Whistlecraft, it won't do. I'll tell you why some day or other. Cornwall's a poet, but spoilt by the detestable schools of the day. Mrs. Hemans is a poet also, but too stilified and apostrophic,—and quite wrong. Men died calmly before the Christian era, and since, without Christianity,—witness the Romans, and lately, Thistlewood, Sandt, and Love—men who ought to have been weighed down with their crimes, even had they believed. A deathbed is a matter of nerves and constitution, and not of religion. Voltaire was frightened, Frederick of Prussia not: Christians the same, according to their strength rather than their creed. What does it * * II * * mean by his stanza? which is octave, got drunk, or gone mad.—He ought to have his ears boxed with Thor's hammer for rhyming so fantastically.'

TO MR. MOORE.

"Bavenna, June 9, 1829.

'Galighani has just sent me the Paris edition of your works, (which I wrote to order,) and I am glad to see my old friends with a French face. I have been skimming and dipping, in and over them, like a swallow, and as pleased as one. It is the first time that I had seen the poet without music, and I don't know how, but I can't read in a music-book—the crotchetts confound the words in my head, though I recollect them perfectly when sung.'

Music assists my memory through the ear, not through the eye; I mean, that her quavers perplex me on paper, but they are a help when heard. And thus I am not unlike to see the days of Guido di Polenta's family, in these parts.

'If the man has been taken off, like Polonius, 'say he made a good end—for a melodrame. The principal security is, that he has not the courage to spend twenty scudi—the average price of a clean-handed brave—otherwise there is no want of opportunity, for I ride about the woods every evening, with one servant, and sometimes an acquaintance, who latterly looks a little queer in solitary bits of bushes. "Good-by.—Write to yours ever, &c."

There is a revolution at Naples. If so, it will probably leave a card at Ravenna in its way to Lombardy.

Your publishers seem to have used you like mine. Murray has shuffled, and almost insinuated that my last productions are dull. Dull, sir—bless me! I don't believe he is right. He begins for the completion of my tragedy on Marino Faliero, none of which has yet gone to England. The fifth act is nearly completed, but it is dreadfully long—forty sheets of large paper, four pages each—for about one hundred and fifty when printed; but so full of pastime and prodigality that I think it will do.

Pray send and publish your poem upon me; and don't be afraid of praising me too highly. I shall pocket my blushes.

Pray, reply. I should like much to share some of your champagne and La Fitte, but I am too Italian for Paris in general. Make Murray send my letter to you if it is full of epigrams.

LETTER CCCXLV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Ravenna, July 17th, 1830.

I have received some books, and Quarterlies, and Edinburghs, for which I am grateful; they contain all I know of England, except by Galignani's newspaper.

The tragedy \( ^{1} \) is completed, but now comes the task of copy and correction. It is very long, (forty-two sheets of long paper, of four pages each,) and I believe must make more than one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty pages. It contains many historical extracts as notes, which I mean to append. History is closely followed. Dr. Moore's account is in some respects false, and in all foolish and flip- pant. None of the chronicles (and I have consulted Sanuto, Sandi, Navagero, and an anonymous Siege of Zara, besides the histories of Laugier, Dura, Simondi, &c,) state, or even hint, that he begged his life; they merely say that he did not deny the conspiracy. He was one of their great men, commander at the siege of Zara,—beat eighty thousand Hungarians, killing eight thousand, and at the same time kept the town he was besieging in order,—took Cape d'Istria; was ambassador at Genoa, Rome, and finally Doge, where he fell for treason, in attempting to alter the government, by what Sanuto calls a judgment on him for, many years before, (when podesta and captain of l' Evissa, having knocked down a bishop, who was sluggish in carrying the host at a procession. He 'saddles him,' as Thwackum did Square, 'with a judgment,' but he does not mention, whether he had been punished, or whether he was tried; the time for what would appear very strange, even now, and must have been still more so in an age of papal power and glory. Sanuto says, that Heaven took away his senses for this buffert, and

The only similar one in history is that of the Fall of Jerusalem,' accuse me of Manicheism? A compliment to which the sweetener of 'one of the mightiest spirits' by no means reconciles me. The poem they review is very noble; but could they not do justice to the writer without converting him into my religious antidote? I am not a Manichean, nor an Anyechan.' I should like to know what harm my 'preaches' have done? I can't tell what people mean by making me a hogoblin.*

LETTER CCCXLVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

'Revoves, August 31, 1829.

'I have 'put my soul' into the tragedy, (as you If it) but you know that there are as many souls as we tragédies. Recollect that it is not a political play, though it may look like it: it is strictly historical. Read the history and judge.'

'Ada's picture is her mother's. I am glad of it —the mother made a good daughter. Send me Gifford's opinion, and never mind the Archbishop. I can neither send you away, nor give you a hundred pistols, nor a better taste; I send you a tragedy, and you asked for facetious epistles: little like your predecessor, who advised Dr. Prideaux to 'put some more humor into his Life of Mahomet.'

'Bankes is a wonderful fellow. There is hardly one of my school or college contemporaries that has not turned out more or less celebrated. Peel, Palmerston, Bankes, Hobhouse, Tavistock, Bob Milis, Douglas Keirnaird, &c., &c., have all talked as been talked about.'

'We are here going to fight a little next month, if the Huns don't cross the Po, and probably if they do. I can't say more now. If anything happens, you have matter for a posthumous work in MS.; so, pray be civil. Depend upon it, there will be savage work, if once they begin here. The French courage proceeds from vanity, the German from phlegm, the Turkish from fanaticism and opium, the Spanish from pride, the English from coolness, the Dutch from obstinacy, the Russian from insensibility, but the Italian from anger; so you see that they will spare nothing.'

* I had congratulated him upon arriving at what Dante calls the "mezzo cammin": 'You should say the prime of life,' a much more consolatory phrase. Besides, it is not correct. I was born in 1788, and consequently am but thirty-two. You are mistaken on another point. The 'Sequin Box' never came into requisition, nor is it likely to do so. It were better that it had, for then a man is not bound, you know. As to reform, I did reform—what we old fogies have? 'Rebellion lay in his way, and he found it, I verily believe that nor you, nor any man of poetical temperament, can avoid a strong passion of some kind. It is the poetry of life. What should I have known or written, had I been a quiet, mercantile politician, or a lord in waiting? A man must travel and turmoil, or there is no existence. Besides, I only meant to be a cavalier serve, and had no idea it would turn out a romance, in the Anglo fashion.'

'However, I suspect I know a thing or two of Italy—more than Lady Morgan has picked up in her posting. What do Englishmen know of Italians beyond their museums and saloons—and some hack * * * en passant? Now, I have lived in the heart of their houses, in parts of Italy freshest and least influenced by strangers, have seen and become (pars magna sui) a portion of their hopes and fears, and passions, and am almost inoculated into a family. This is to see men and things as they are.'

'You say that I called you 'quiet'—I don't recollect any thing of the sort. On the contrary you are always in scarpas.'

'What think you of the Queen? I hear Mr Hoby says, 'that it makes him weep to see her, she reminds him so much of Jane Shore.'

'Mr. Hoby, the bookmaker's heart is quite sore,' For seeing the Queen makes him think of Jane Shore; And, in fact, * * * * * * * * * Pray, excuse this ribaldry. What is your poem about? Write and tell me all about it and you.'

'Yours, &c.'

'P.S. Did you write the lively quiz on Peter Bell? It has hit enough to be yours, and almost too much to be any body else's now going. It was in Galgani the other day or week.'

LETTER CCCXLVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

'Revoves September 7, 1829.

'In correcting the proofs you must refer to the manuscript, because there are in it various readings. Pray attend to this, and choose what Gifford thinks best. Let me hear what he thinks of the whole.'

'You speak of Lady * *'s illness; she is not of those who die—the amiable only do; and those whose death would do good live. Whenever she is pleased to return, it may be presumed she will take her 'divining rod' along with her: it may be of use to her at home, as well as to the 'rich man' of the Evangelists.'

'Pray, do not let the papers paragraph me back to England. They may say what they please, any loathsome abuse but that. Contradict it.'

'My last letters will have taught you to expect an explosion here: it was primed and loaded, but they hesitated to fire the train. One of the cities shirked from the league. I cannot write more at large for a thousand reasons. Our 'puir hill folk' deferred to strike, and raise the first banner, but Bo- logna paused; and now 'tis autumn, and the season half over. 'O Jerusalem! Jerusalem!' The Huns are on the Po; but if once they pass it on their way to Naples, all Italy will be behind them. The dogs— the wolves—may they perish like the host of Sennacherib! If you want to publish the Prophecy of Dante, you never will have a better time.'

* I had mistaken the concluding words of his letter of the 9th of June—Moore.
LETTER CCCXLIX.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havens, Sept. 11, 1820.

"Here is another historical note for you. I want to be as near truth as the drama can be.

"Last post I sent you a note fierce as Faliero himself;* in answer to a trashy tourist, who pretends that he could have been introduced to me. Let me have a proof of it, that I may cut its lava into some shape.

"What Gifford says is very consolatory, (of the first act,) English, sterling genuine English, is a desideratum among you, and I am glad that I have got so much left; though Heaven knows how I retain it; I hear none bad from my valet, and his is Nottinghamshire; and I see none but in your new publications, and their's is no language at all, but jargon. Even your * * * * is terribly stilted and affected, with 'very, very' so soft and paunchy.

"Oh! if ever I do come among you again, I will give you such a 'Baviad and Mavilad!' not as good as the old, but even better merited. There never was such a set as your ragsamuffins, (I meant not yours only, but every body's.) What with the Cockney's, and the Lakes, and the Roundhead, Scott, and Moore, and Byron, you are in the very uttermost decline and degradation of literature. I can't think of it without all the remorse of a murderer. I wish that Johnson were alive again to crush them!"

LETTER CCCCL.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havens, Sept. 14, 1820.

"What! not a line? Well, have it in your own way.

"I wish you would inform Perry that his stupid paragraph is the cause of all my newspapers being stopped in Paris.† The fools believe me in your infernal country, and have not sent on their gazettes, so that I know nothing of your beastly trial of the Queen.

"I cannot avail myself of Mr. Gifford's remarks, because I have received none, except on the first act.

"P. S. So, pray, beg the editors of papers to say anything blackguard they please; but not to put me among their arrivals. They do me more mischief by such nonsense than all their abuse can do."

LETTER CCCCLI.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havens, Sept. 21, 1820.

"If you are at your old tricks again. This is the second packet I have received unaccompanied by a single line of good, bad, or indifferent. It is strange that you have never forwarded any farther observations of Gifford's. How am I alter or unend, if I hear no farther? or does this shew mean that it is well enough as it is, or too bad to be repaired? if the last, why do you not say so at once, instead of playing pretty, while you know that soon or late you must out with the truth.

"P. S. My sister tells me, that you sent her to inquire where I was, believing in my arrival 'driuing a curriule,' &c., &c., into Palace-yard. Do you think me a coxcomb or a madman, to be capable of such an exhibition? I wish you knew me better, and told you, that could not be me. You might as well have thought me entering on 'a pale horse,' like Death in the Revelations."

LETTER CCCCLII.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havens, Sept. 26, 1820.

"Get from Mr. Hobhouse, and send me a proof (with the Latin) of my Hints from Italy; it has now the nomas premature in annum complete for its production, being written at Athens in 1811. I have a notion that, with some omissions of names and passages, it will do; and could put my late observations for Pope among the notes, with the date of 1820, and so on. As far as versification goes, it is good; and on looking back to what I wrote about that period, I am astonished to see how little I have been. I am now; I wrote the last, and no; but that comes of my having fallen into the atrocious but taste of the times. If I can trim it for present publication, what with the other things you have on mine, you will have a volume of verse at variety at least, for there will be all measures, styles, and topics, whether good or no. I am anxious to hear what Gifford thinks of the tragedy; pray let me know. I really do not know what to think myself.

"If the Germans pass the Po, they will be treated to a mass out of the Cardinal de Retz's Breviary. * It's a fool, and could not understand this. There will. It is as pretty a conceit as you would wish to see on a summer's day.

"Nobby here believes a word of the evidence against the Queen. The very mob cry shame against their countrymen, and say that for half the money spent upon the trial, any testimony whatever may be brought out of Italy. This you may rely upon as fact. I told you as much before. As to what travellers report, what are travellers? Now I have lived among the Italians—not Florence, and Hipped, and gathered, and conversationed it a few months, and then home again; but been of their families, and friendships, and feuds, and loves, and councils, and correspondence, in a part of Italy least known to foreigners—and have been among them of all classes, from the Conte to the Contadine; and you may be sure of what I say to you.

LETTER CCCCLIII.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havens, Sept. 28, 1820.

"I thought that I had told you long ago, that it never was intended nor written with any view to the stage. I have said so in the preface too. It is too long and too regular for your stage, the persons few, and the unity too much observed. It is more like a play of the great than your stage. (I say this humbly in speaking of that great man;) but there is poetry, and it is equal to Manfred, though I know not what esteem is held of Manfred.

"I have now been nearly as long out of England as I was there during the time I saw you frequently. I came home July 14th, 1811, and left again April 25th, 1816: so that Sept. 28th, 1820, brings me within a very few months of the same duration of time of my stay and my absence. In course, I can know nothing of the public taste and feelings, but from the letters.

Said to be as bad as possible.

"I thought Austrians excellent: did I not say so? Mathematics Diary most excellent; it, and Forsyth, and parts of Hobhouse are all we have of truth or sense from Italy. The highest style in all the styles of the day, which are all bourgeois (I don't except my own—no one has done more through negligence to corrupt the language); but it is neither English nor poetry. Time will show.

"I am sorry Gifford has made no further remarks beyond the first act: does he think all the English equally stupid as he thought the first? You did right to send the proofs; I was a fool; but I do not regret the signs of proofs: it is an absurdity; but comes from laziness.

"You can steal the two Juanis into the world quietly tagged to the others. The play as you will—the Dante too; but the Puls I am proud of: it surpasses all the trashy nonsense one such troupe can produce. It is the best thing I ever did in my life. I wrote the play from beginning to end, and not a single scene without interruption, and being obliged to break off in the course of a single line and put my head, too; just so: it can be no great shakes—I mean the play; and the head too, if you like.

"P. S. Politics here still savage and uncertain. However, we are all in our "bandittes" to join the Highlanders if they cross the Forth, i.e., to crush the Austrians if they cross the Po. The rascals—and that dog Liverpool, to say their subjects are happy! If ever I come back, I'll work some of these ministers.

"Sept. 29."

"I open my letter to say that on reading more of the four volumes on Italy, where the author says 'declined an introduction,' I perceive (horresco referens) it is written by a WOMAN!!! In that case I must suppress my note and answer, and all I have said about the book and the writer. I never dreamed of it until now, in my extreme wrath at that precious note. I can only say that I am accurate, I refuse, if it is the same—who said? What I would have said to one of the other sex you know already. Her book too (as a she book) is not a bad one; but she evidently don't know the Italians, or rather don't like them, and forgets the classics. Matthew and Forsyth are your men for the truth and tact, and has gone over Italy in company—always a bad plan: you must be alone with people to know them well. Ask her, who was the 'desendant of Lady M. W. Montague,' and by whom? by Algarotti?

"I suspect that in Marino Faliero, you and yours won't like the politics which are perilous to you in these times; but recollect that it is not a political play, and that I was obliged to put into the mouths of the characters the sentiments upon which they acted. I hate all things written like Pizarro, to represent France, England, and so forth. All I have done is meant to be purely Venetian, even to the very prophecy of its present state.

"Your Angles in general know little of the Italians, who detest them for their numbers and their Cosa da treachery. Besides, the English travellers have not been composed of the best company. How could they?—out of one hundred thousand, how many gentlemen were there, or honest men?

"P. S. Aristophanes is excellent. Send me the rest of it.

"These fools will force me to write a book about Italy myself, to give them the 'lugubrious.' They suppose about assassination; what is it but the origin of dueling—and a wild justice, as Lord Bacon calls it? I have the fount of my honor in what the laws can't or won't reach. Every man is liable to it more or less, according to circumstances or place. For instance, I am living here exposed to it daily, for I have happened to make a powerful and unprincipled man my enemy—and I never sleep the worse for it, or ride in less solitary places, because precaution is useless, and one thinks of it as of a disease which may or may not strike. It is true, that there are those who, if he did, would 'ive to think on'; but that would not awake my bones: I should be sorry if it would, were they once at rest."

LETTER CCCCLIV

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Havrevo, Sept. 29, 1850.

"You will have now received all the acts, corrected, of the Marino Faliero. What you say of the 'boot of one hundred guineas,' made by some one who says that he saw me last week, reminds me of what had happened in 1810; you can easily ascertain the fact, and what I meant.

"In the latter end of 1811, I met one evening at the Alfred my old school and form-fellow, (for we were within two of each other, he the higher, though both very near the top of our remove.) Peel, the Irish Secretary. He told me that, in 1810, he met me, as he thought, in St. James' street, but we passed without speaking. He mentioned this, and it was denied as impossible; I being then in Turin. A day or two afterwards, he pointed out to his brother a person on the opposite side of the way:—'There,' said he, 'is the man whom I took for Byron.' His brother instantly answered, 'Why it is Byron, and no one else.' But this is not all—I was seen by some body to write down my name among the inquirers after the king's health, then attacked by insanity. Now, at this very period, as nearly as I could make out, I was ill of a strong fever at Patras, caught in the marshes near Olympia, from the malaria. If I had died there, it would have been a new ghost story for you. You can easily make out the accuracy of this from Peel himself, who told it in detail. I suppose you will be able to put the opinion of Lucretius (who abhors the mortality of the soul, but) asserts that from the flying off of the surfaces of bodies, these surfaces or cases, like the coats of an onion, are sometimes seen entire when they are separated from it, so that the shapes and shadows of both the dead and living are frequently beheld.

"But if they are, are their coats and waistcoats also seen? I do not disbelieve that we may be two by some unconscious process, to a certain sign, but which of these two I happen at present to be, I leave you to decide. I only hope that other me behaves like a garrulous.

"I wish you would get Peel asked how far I am accurate in my recollection of what he told me, for I don't like to say such things without authority.

"I am not sure that I was not spoken with, but this also you can ascertain. I have written to you such letters that I stop.

"Yours, &c.

"P. S. Last year (in June, 1819) I met at Count Monti's, at Ferrara, an Italian, who asked me if I knew Lord Byron. It is told him no. (you know, yourself, you know.) 'Then,' says he, 'I do; I met him at Naples the other day.' I pulled out my card and asked him if that was the way he spelt his name: he answered, yes. I suspect that it was a blackguard navy surgeon, who attended a young travelling madman about, and passed himself for a lord at the posh houses. He was a vulgar dog—quick to do a split order—and a precious representative I must have had of him, if it was even so; but I don’t know. He passed himself off as a gentleman, and quivered about a Countess — (of this place) then at Venice, an ugly battered woman, of bad morals even for Italy.

LETTER CCCCLV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

“Foscolo’s letter is exactly the thing wanted; firstly, because he is a man of genius; and, next, because he is an Italian, and therefore the best judge of Italians. Besides, that is, he is more of the ancient Greek than of the modern Italian. ... Thus, and somewhat, as Douglas Dalgerty says, ‘too wild and savage, (like ‘Ronald of the Mist’), ‘tis a wonderful man, and my friends Hobhouse and Rose both swear by him; and they are good judges of men and of Italian humanity.

‘He’s more an antique Roman than a Dane’

Gifford says it is good ‘sterling, genuine English,’ and Foscolo says that the characters are right Venetian. Shakespeare and Otway had a million of advantages over me besides the incalculable one of being dead from one to two centuries, and having been both born, blackguards, (which are such attractions to the gentle living reader;) let me then preserve the only one which I could possibly have—that of having been at Venice, and entered more into the local spirit of it. I claim no more.

I know what Foscolo means about Calendario’s spitting at Bertram; that’s national—the objection, I mean. The Italians and French, with those ‘flags of abomination,’ their pocket-handkerchiefs, spit there, and here, and everywhere else—in your face, almost, and therefore object to it on the stage as too familiar. But who spit nowhere—but in a man’s face when we grow savage—are not likely to feel this. Remember Massinger, and Kean’s ‘Sir Giles Overreach’.

Lord! I saw I spit at thee and not thy counsel!”

Besides, Calendario does not spit in Bertram’s face; he spits at him, as I have seen the Mussulmans do upon the ground when they are in a rage. Again, he does not in fast despeire Bertram, though he affects it,—as we all do, when angry with one we think our inferior. He is angry at not being allowed to die in his own way, (although not afraid of death;) and recollect that he suspected and hated Bertram from the first. Israel Burtceco, on the other hand, is a cooler and more concentrated fellow: he acts upon principle and Impulse; Calendario upon impulse and example.

“So there’s argument for you.

The Doge repeats,—true, but it is from engrossing passion, and because he sees different persons, and is always obliged to recur to the cause uppermost in his mind. His speeches are long—true; but I wrote for the closet, and on the French and Italian model rather than yours, which I think not very highly of, for all your old dramatists who are long enough, too, God knows.—look into any of them.

1: ‘turn you Foscolo’s letter, because it alludes also to his private affairs. I am sorry to see such a man in straits, because I know what they are, or what they were. I never met but three men who would have held out a finger to me: one was your self, the other William Banke’s, and the other a nobleman long ago;”

But of these then the first was the only one who offered it while I really wanted it; the second from good-will—but I was not in need of Banke’s aid, and would not have accepted it if I had, (though I love and esteem him;) and the third—*}

“So you see that I have seen some strange things in my time. As for your own offer, it was in 1815 when I was in actual uncertainty of five pounds. I rejected it; but I have not forgotten it, although you probably have.

“P. S. Foscolo’s Riccardo was lent, with the leaves uncut, to some Italians, now in villeggiatura, so that I have had no opportunity of hearing their decision, or of reading it. They seized on it as Foscolo’s, on account of the beauty of the paper and printing, directly. If I find it takes, I will reprint it here. The Italians think as highly of Foscolo as they can of any man, divided and miserable as they are, and with neither leisure at present to read, nor head nor heart to judge of any thing but extracts from French newspapers and the Luguano Gazette.

“We are all looking at one another, like wolves on their prey in pursuit, only waiting for the first falling on to do unutterable things. They are a great world in chaos or angels in hell, which you please; but out of chaos came paradise, and out of hell—I don’t know what; but the devil wages it there, and he was a fine fellow once, you know.

“You need never favor me with any periodical publication, except the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and an occasional Blackwood; or now and then a Monthly Review: for the rest I do not feel curiosity enough to look beyond their covers.

“To be sure I took in the editor of the British Almanac. He fell precisely into the glistening trap laid for him. It was inconceivable how he could be so absurd as to imagine us serious with him.

“Recollect, that if you put my name to ‘Don Juan’ in these coming days, any lawyer might oppose my guardian right of my daughter in chancery, on the plea of its containing the parody,—such are the perils of a foolish jest. I was not aware of this at the time, but you will find it correct, I believe; and you may be sure that the Noahs would not let it slip. Now I prefer my child to a poem at any time, and so should you, as having half a dozen.

“Let me know your notions.

“If you turn over the earlier pages of the Huntington manuscript, you will see how common a name Ada was in the early Plantagenet days. I found it in my own pedigree in the reign of John and Henry, and gave it to my daughter. It was also the name of Charlemagne’s sister. It is in an early chapter of Genesis, as the name of the wife of Launcet; and I suppose Ada is the feminine of Adam. It is short, ancient, vocalic, and had been in my family, for which reason I gave it to my daughter.”

"The Abbot has just arrived; many thanks; as also for the Monastery—when you send it!!

"The Abbot will have a more than ordinary interest for me, for an ancestor of mine by the mother's side, Sir J. Gordon of Gight, the handsomest of his day, died on a seacoast at Aberdeen for his loyalty to Mary, of whom he was an importunate purveyor as well as her relation. His fate was much commented on in the Chronicles of the Times. If I am mistaken, I beg you to make sure with her escape from Loch Leven, or with her captivity there. But this you will know better than I.

"I recollect Loch Leven as it were but yesterday, I saw it in my way to England, in 1788, being then ten years of age. My mother who was as 'angry as Lucifer with her descent from the Stuarts, and her right line from the old Gordons, not the Seyton Gordons, as she disdainfully termed the ducal branch, told me the story, always making me how superior her Gordons were to the southern Byrons,—notwithstanding our Norman, and always masculine descent, which has never lapsed into a female, as my mother's Gordons had done in her own person.

"P. S. Let me know what Mr. Hobhouse and you have decided about the two prose letters and their publication.

"I enclose you an Italian abstract of the German translator of Manfred's Appendix, in which you will perceive quoted what Goethe says of the whole body of English poetry, (and not of me in particular.) On this the Dedication is founded, as you will perceive, though I had thought of it before, for I look upon him as a great man."

"Dedication to Baron Goethe, &c., &c., &c.

"Sir,

"In the Appendix to an English work lately translated into German and published at Leipsic, a judgment of yours upon English poetry is quoted as follows: "That in English poetry, great genius, universal power, a feeling of profundity, with sufficient tenderness and force, are to be found; but that altogether these do not constitute poets," &c., &c.

"I regret to see a great man falling into a great mistake. This opinion of yours only proves that the "Dictionary of ten thousand living English authors" has not been translated into German. You will have read, in your friend Schlegel's version, the dialogue in Macbeth—

"There are ten thousand!"

"Macbeth. Good, Wedder."

"Answer. Author's sit!"

give a bailioci to see;—bating the rest of the same author, and an occasional Edinburgh and Quarterly, as brief chroniclers of the times. Instead of this, here are Johnny Keats's poetry, and three novels, by God knows whom, except that there is Popery * * * to one of them, with a matter within which I thought we had sent back to her spinning. Crayon is very good; Hogg's Tales rough but racy, and welcome.

Books of travel are expensive, and I don't want them now, having travelled already; besides, they incite me not to the author of 'The Profligate' for his (or her) present. Pray send me no more poetry but what is rare and decidedly good. There is such a taste like to be attached to such trivies that I am ashamed to look at them. I say nothing against your person's, your Smith's, and your Croly's—it is all very fine—but pray dispense me from the pleasure. Instead of poetry if you will favor me with a few soda powders, I shall be delighted; but all prose (bating travels and novels not by Scott) is welcome, especially Scott's Tales of My Landlord, and so on.

In the notes to Marino Falerio, it may be as well to say that 'Benvenuto' was not written in the Pen, but merely Grand Chancellor, a separate office, (although important;) it was an arbitrary alteration of mine. The Doges too were all buried in St. Mark's before Falerio. I am singular that when his predecessor, Andrea Dandolo died, the Ten made a law that all the future Doges should be buried with their families, in their own churches,—one would think by a kind of presentiment. So all that is said of his ancestral Doges, as buried at St. John's and Paul's, is altered from the fact, they being in St. Mark's. Make a note of this, and put Editor as the subscription to it.

"As I make such pretensions to accuracy, I should only like to be trusted even on this score. Of the play they may say what they please, but not so of my costume and dram. pers. they having been real existences.

"I omitted Poscol in my list of living Venetian notaries in the notes, considering him as an Italian in general, and not a mere provincial like the rest; and as an Italian I have spoken of him in the preface to canto fourth of Childe Harold.

"The French translation of us! ! ! omé! omé! and the German; but I don't understand the latter, and his long dissertation at the end about the Fausts. Excuse haste. Of politics it is not safe to speak, but nothing is decided as yet.

"I am in a very fierce humor at not having Scott's Monastery.—You are too liberal in quantity, and somewhat careless of the quality, of your missives. All the Quarterly (four in number) I had had before from you, and two of the Edinburgh; but no matter, we shall have new ones by-and-by. No more Keats, I entreat—day him alike; if some of you don't, I must skin him myself. There is no bearing the drizzling idiom of the manikin.

"I don't feel inclined to care farther about 'Don Juan.' What do you think a very pretty Italian lady said to me the other day? I hope you read it in the French, and paid me some compliments, with due drawbacks, upon it. I answered that what she said was true, but that I suspected it would live longer than Childe Harold.—'Ah, but' (said she), 'I believe more than two years, and was sure that 'Don Juan' is immortal. The truth is that it is too true, and the women hate many things which strip off the tinsel of senti- ment, and that it would rob them of their weapons. I never knew a woman who did not hate De Grammont's Memoirs for the same reason: even Lady * * used to abuse them.

"Rose's work I never received. It was seized at Verona by the officers, and sent to Huna, with all their two hundred thousand men, that they dare not let such a volume as his circulate" tion than mine, although considerably less than yours. It is owing to this neglect on the part of your German translators that you are not aware of the works of * * * * * * *

"There is also another, named * * * * * * * * * * * * *

"I mention these poets by way of sample to enlighten you. They form but two bricks of our Babel, (Windsor bricks, by-the-way,) but may serve for a specimen of the building.

"It is, moreover, asserted that "the predominating character of the whole body of the present English poetry is a disgust and contempt for life." But I rather suspect that, by one single work of prose, you yourself have excited a greater contempt for life than all the English volumes of poetry that ever were written. Madame de Staël says, that "Werther has occasioned more suicides than the most beautiful woman;" and I really believe that he has put more individuals out of this world than Napoleon himself,—except in the way of his profession. Perhaps, illustrous sir, the acrimonious judgment passed by a celebrated northern journal upon you, in particular, and the Germans in general, has rather disposed you towards English poetry as well as criticism. But you must not regard our critics, who are at bottom good-natured fellows, considering their two professions; taking up the law in count, and laying it down out of it. No one can more lament their hasty and unfair judgment, in your particular, than I do; and I so expressed myself to your friend Schlegel, in 1816, at Cöpet.

"In behalf of my "ten thousand" living brethren, and of myself, I have thus far taken notion of an opinion expressed with regard to "English poetry" in general, and which merited notice, because it is yours.

"My principal object in addressing you was to testify my sincere respect and admiration of a man, who, for half a century, has led the literature of a great nation, and will go down to posterity as the first literary character of his age.

"You have been fortunate, sir, not only in the writings which have illustrated your name, but in the name itself, as being sufficiently musical for the articulation of posterity. In this you have the advantage of some of your co-nationals, whose names would perhaps be immortal also—if any body could pronounce them.

"It may, perhaps, be supposed, by this apparent tone of levity, that I am wanting in intentional respect towards you; but this will be a mistake: I am always flippant in prose. Considering you, as I really and warmly do, in common with all your own, and with most of our nation, to be the first literary character which has existed in Europe since the death of Voltaire, I felt, and felt, desirous to inscribe to you the following work,—not as being either a tragedy or a poem, (for I cannot pronounce upon its pretensions to be either one or the other, or both, or neither,) but as a mark of esteem and admiration from a foreigner to the man who has been hailed in Germany "THE GREAT POET." "

"I have, with the truest respect,

"Your most obedient

"And very humble servant,

"BYRON.""

P.S. I perceive that in Germany, as well as in Italy, there is the same struggle about what they call "Classical," and "Romantic,"—terms which were not subjects of classification in England, at least when I left it four or five years ago. Some of the English scholars, it is true, abused "classical" and "romantic," but the reason was that they themselves did not know how to write either prose or verse; but nobody thought them worth making a sect of. Perhaps there may be something of the kind sprung up lately, but I have not heard much about it, and it would be such bad taste that I shall be very sorry to believe it."

LETTER CCCCLX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Reyvena, October 17, 1826.

"You owe me two letters—pay them. I want to know what you are about. The summer is over and you will be back to Paris. Apropos of Paris it was not Sophia Gall, but Sophia Gay—the English word Gay—who was my correspondent. Can you tell who she is, as you did of the defunct * * * ?

"Have you gone on with your poem? I have received the French manuscript. Of course it has been translated into a foreign language in such an abominable travesty! It is useless to rail, but one can’t help it.

"Have you got my memoir copied? I have begun a continuation. Shall I send it you as far as it is gone?

"I can’t say any thing to you about Italy, for the government here look upon me with a suspicious eye, as I am well informed. Pretty fellows if I, a solitary stranger, could do any mischief. It is because I am fond of rifle and pistol shooting, I believe; for they took the alarm at the quantity of cartridges I got gone,—the Laker *

"The queen has made a pretty theme for the journals. Was there ever such evidence published? Why it is worse than 'Little's Poems' or 'Don Juan.' If you don't write soon, I will 'make you a speech.'

"Yours. &c."

LETTER CCCCLXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Reyvena, Sept. 23, 1826.

"Pray forward the enclosed to Lady Byron. It is on business.

"In thanking you for the Abbot, I made four grand mistakes. Sir John Gordon was not of Gight, but of Bognaght, and a son of Hunter's. He suffered not for his loyalty, but in an insurrection. He had nothing to do with Loch Leven, having been dead some time at the period of the Queen's confinement: and, forthwith, I am not sure that he was the Queen's paramour or no, for Robertson does not allude to this, though Walter Scott does, in the list he gives of her admirers (as unfortunate) at the close of 'the Abbot.'

"I must have made all these mistakes in recollecting my mother's account of the matter, although she was more accurate than I, being precise upon points of genealogy, like all the aristocratical Scotch. She had a long list of ancestors, like Sir Lucas O'Trigger's, most of whom are to be found in the old Scotch Chronicles, &c., in arms and doing mischief. I remember well passing Loch Leven, as well as the Queen's Ferry: we were out of the way to England in 1788. Yours.

"You had better not publish 'Blackwood and the Robert's prose, except what regards Pope:—you have let the time slip by.'"
LETTER CCCLXI.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravena, June 4, 1830.

'I have received from Mr. Galignani the enclosed letters, duplicates, and receipts, which explain the whole. As the poems are your property, by purchase, right, and justice, all matters of publication, &c., &c., are for you to decide upon. I know not how far my compliance with Mr. Galignani's request might be legal, and I doubt that it would not be honest. In case you choose to arrange with him, I enclose the permits to you, and in so doing I wash my hands of the business altogether. I sign them merely to enable you to exert the power you justly possess more properly. I will have nothing to do with it further, except, in my answer to Mr. Galignani, to state that the letters, &c., &c., are sent to you, and the causes thereof.

'If you can check these foreign pirates, do, if not, put the permissive papers in the fire. I can have no view nor object whatever, but to secure to you your property.

'Yours, &c.'

P. S. I have read part of the Quarterly just arrived; Mr. Bowles, at least, is convinced; he is not quite correct in his statement about English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. They support Pope, I see, in the Quarterly; let them continue to do so; it is a sin, and a shame, and a damnation to think that Pope! should range against it—but Does! These miserable mountebanks of the day, the poets, disgrace themselves and deny God in running down Pope, the most faultless of poets, and almost of men.'

LETTER CCCLXII.
TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, Nov. 5, 1830.

'Thanks for your letter, which has come somewhat coldly—but better late than never. Of it anon. Mr. Galignani, of the press, hath, it seems, been sub-planted and sub-pirated by another Parisian publisher, who has audaciously printed an edition of 1d. at the ultra-liberal price of five francs, and (as Galignani piteously observes) sells five francs only for booksellers! hooroo referencis; Think of a man's whole works producing so little! Galignani sends me, post haste, a permission for him to send to me, to publish, &c., &c., which permits I have signed and sent to Mr. Murray, of Albemarle street. Will you explain to G. that I have no right to dispose of Murray's works without his leave, and therefore I must refer him to M. to get the permit out of his clutches—no easy matter I suspect. I have written to G. to say as much; but a word of mouth from a great brother author would convince him that I could not honestly have complied with his wish, though I might legally. What I could do I have done, viz., signed the warrant and sent it to Murray. Let the dogs divide the carcass, if it is killed to their liking.

'I am glad of your epigram. It is odd that we should both let our wits run away with our sentiments; for I am sure that we are both Queen's men at bottom. But there is no resisting a clinch—it is so clever! A topic or thought of that—we have a 'dipthong' also in this part of the world—not a Greek, but a Spanish one—do you understand me?—which is about to blow up the whole alphabet. It was first pronounced at Naples, and is spreading; but we are nearer the barbarians; who are in great 'oree or the Po, and will pass it, with the first legitimat

'P. S. There will be the devil to pay, and there is no saying who will or who will not be set down in his bill. If 'honor should come unlooked for to any of your acquaintance, make a melody of it, that his ghost, like poor Yorick's, may have the satisfaction of being platinously pitied—or still more nobly commemorated, like 'Oh breathe not his name.' In case you should not think him worth it, here is a chant for you instead—

'When a man hath no freedom to fight for at once,
Let him combat for that of his neighbor.
Let him think of the g-g-g-g-races of Greece and Rome
And get knock'd on, he heard for his labor.'

'To do good to mankind is the chiral plan,
And is always an nobly required;
Then battle for freedom wherever you can
And, if not elected thereof, you're knighted.'

'So you have gotten the letter of 'Epigrams' I am glad of it. You will not be so, for I shall send you more. Here is one I wrote for the endorsement of 'the Deed of Separation' in 1816; but the lawyers objected to it, as superfluous. It was written as we were getting up the signing and sealing. * * has the original.'

'Endorsement of the Deed of Separation, in the April of 1815.

'In a year ago, you swore, said the
'To love, to honor,' and so forth:
Such was the vow you pledged to me,
And here's exactly what 'twas worth.'

'For the anniversary of January 2, 1821, I have a small grateful anticipation, which, in case of accident, I add—

'To Penelope, January 2, 1821.

'This day, of all our days, has done
The word for me and you—
'Tis just six years since we were one,
And few done we were two.'

'Pray, excuse all this nonsense; for I must talk nonsense just now for fear of wandering to more serious topics, which, in the present state of things, is not safe by a foreign post.'

'I told you in my last, that I had been going on with the 'Memoirs,' and have got as far as twelve more sheets. But I suspect they will be interrupted. In that case I will send them on by post, though I feel remorse at making a friend pay so much for postage, for we can't frank here beyond the frontier.'

'I shall be glad to hear of the event of the Queen's concern. As to the ultimate effect, the most inevitable one to you and me (if they and we live so long) will be that the Miss Moores and Miss Byrons will present us with a great variety of grandchilden by different fathers.

'Pray, where did you get hold of Goethe's Florentine husband-killing story? upon such matters, in general, I may say, with Beau Clanchey, in reply to Errand's wife—

'Oh the villain, he hath murdered my poor Timothy.'

'Clinker. Damn your Timothy!—I tell you, woman, your husband has murdered me—he has carried away my fine jubilee clothes.'

'So Bowles has been telling a story, too, (tis in the Quarterly,) about the woods of 'Madera,' and so forth. I shall be at Bowles again, if he is no quiet. He misstates, or mistakes, in a point or two. The paper is finished and so is the letter.'

'Yours, &c.'

* Mr. Galignani had applied to Lord Byron with the view of procuring from him such legal right over those works of his of which he had hitherto seen the sole publisher in France would enable him to send out copies, but we are from wanting the same in England.
LETTER CCCLXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, Sep. 2, 1819.

"The talent you approve of is an amiable one, and might prove a national service; but unfortunately I must be angry with a man before I draw his real portrait; and I can't deal in 'generals,' so that I trust some honest hand has provoked enough to make a gallery. If 'the parson' had not by many little dirty sneaking traits provoked it, I should have been silent, though I had observed him. Here follows an alteration: put—

"Devil, with such delight in damning,
That is to say, if these two new lines do not too much lengthen out and weaken the amiability of the original thought and expression. You have a discretionary power about showing. I should think that Croker would not discern a sight of these light little humorous things, and may be indulged now and then.

"Why, I do like one or two vices, to be sure; but I can back a horse and fire a pistol 'without thinking or blinking' like Major Sturgeon; I have fed at times for two months together on sheers biscuit and water, (without metaphor;) I can get over seventy or eighty miles a day riding post, and swim free at a stretch, as at Venice, in 1818, or at least I could do, and have done it once.

"I know Henry Matthews; he is the image, to the very voice, of his brother Charles, only darker—his cough his in particular. The first time I ever met him was in Scrope Davies's room after his brother's death, and I nearly dropped, thinking that it was his ghost. I have also dined with him in his rooms at King's College. Hobhouse once purported a similar memoir; but I am afraid the letters of Charles's correspondence with me (which are at Whiton with my other papers) would hardly do for the public; for our lives were not over strict, and our letters somewhat lax upon most subjects.

"Last week I sent you a correspondence with Galigani, and some documents on your property. You have now, I think, an opportunity of checking, or at least limiting, those French republications. You may let all your authors publish what they please against me and mine. A publisher is not, and cannot be responsible for all the works that issue from his printer's.

"The White Lady of Arvenel,' is not quite so good as a real well authenticated ('Dona Blanca') White Lady of Caloto, or spectre in the Marcia Trivigna, who has been repeatedly seen. There is a man (a huntsman) now alive who saw her also. Hoppner could tell you all about her, and so can Rose, perhaps. I myself have no doubt of the fact, historical and spectral. She always appeared on particular occasions, before the deaths of the family; &c., &c. I heard Madame Benzonzi say, that she knew a gentleman who had seen her cross his room at Caloto Castle. Hoppner saw and spoke with the huntsman, who met her at the chase, and never hunted afterward. She was a girl attendant, who, one day dressing the hair of a Countess Colato, was seen by her mistress to smile upon her husband in the glass. The Countess had her shut up in the wall of the castle, like Constance de Beverley. Ever after, she haunted them and all the Colatos. She is described a celebrated hair-dresser.

LETTER CCCLXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, Sep. 17, 1819.

"The death of Waite is a shock to the teeth, as well as to the feelings of all who knew him. Good God, he and Blake both gone! I left them both in the most robust health, and little thought of the national loss in so short a time as five years. They were both as much superior to Wellington is rational greatness, as he who preserves the hair and the teeth is preferable to 'bloody blustering varier' who gives them name by breaking heads and knocking out grinders. Who succeeds him? Where is tooth-powder, mild, and yet efficacious—where is tincture—where are clearing-roots and brushes now to be obtained? Pray obtain what in formation you can upon these 'Tuscanian questions.' My jaws ache to think on't. Poor fellows! I anticipated seeing both again; and yet they are gone to that place where both teeth and hair last longer than on this earth. A thousand graves opened, and always perceived, that whatever was gone, the teeth and hair remain with those who had died with them. Is not this odd? They go the very first things in youth, and yet last the longest in the dust, if people will but die to preserve them! It is a queer life, and a queer death, that of mortals.

"I knew that Waite had married, but little thought that the other measure was so soon to overtake him. Then he was such a delight, such a coxcomb, such a jewel of a man! There is a tailor at Bologna so like him! and also at the top of his profession. Do not neglect this commission or what can replace him? What says the public?

"I remand you the preface. Don't forget that the Italian extract from the Chronicle must be translated. With regard to what you say of touching the Juans and the Haps, it is all very well; but I can't dismiss. I am like the tiger, (in poesy,) if I miss the first spring I go growling back to my jungle. There is no second: I can't correct; I can't, and I won't. Nobody ever succeeds in it; great or small. Tasso remade the whole of his Jerusalem: but who ever reads that version? all the world goes to the first. Pope added to 'The Rape of the Lock,' but did not reduce it. You must take my things as they happen to be. If they are not likely to suit, reduce their estimate accordingly. I would rather give them away than hack and hew them. I don't say that you are not right; I merely repeat that I cannot better them, or either make a spoof or spoil a horn; and there's an end.

"P. S. Of the praises of that little • • • Keats, I shall observe, as Johnson did when Sheridan the actor got a pension. 'What! has he got a pension? Then it is time that I should give up mine!' Nobody could be prinder of the praise of the Edinburgh than I was, or more alive to their censure, as I showed in my critical bars and Scotch Reviewers. At present, all those they have ever praised are degraded by that insane article. Why don't they review and praise 'Solomon's Guide to Health?' it is better sense and as much poetry as Johnny Keats.

"Bowls must be boweled down. 'Tis a sad match at cricket if he can get any notches at Pope's expense. If he once get into 'Lord's ground,' (to bountine because it is folio,) I think I could beat him in one innings. You did not know, perhaps, that I was once (not metaphorically, but really) a good cricketer, particularly in batting, and I played in the Harrow match against Eton in 1816, gaining a half-dozen notches (some of our chosen eleven) than any, except Lord Ipswich and Brook man, on our side."

* His death.

• A celebrated hair-dresser.
LETTER CCLXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

- What you said of the late Charles Skimmer Matthews has set me to my recollections; but I have not been able to turn up any thing which would do for the purposed memoir of his brother, even if he had previously done enough during his life to sanction the inclusion of anecdotes merely personal.

He was, however, a very extraordinary man, and would have been a great one. No one ever succeeded in a more surpassing degree than he did, as far as his sphere of usefulness is concerned; for whenever he stripped, he overthrew all antagonists. His conquests will be found registered at Cambridge, particularly his Downing one, which was hotly and highly contested, and yet easily won. Hobhouse was his most intimate friend, and can tell you more of him than any man. William Bankes also a great deal. I myself recollect more of his oddities than of his academical qualities, for we lived most together at a very idle period of his life. We went up to Trinity in 1830, at the age of seventeen and a half, I was miserable and untoward to a degree. I was wretched at leaving Harrow, to which I had become attached during the last two years of my stay there; wrapt up in the life and scene of Oxford (there were no rooms vacant at Christchurch,) wretched from some private domestic circumstances of different kinds, and consequently about as unsocial as a wolf taken from the wild. So that, although I knew Matthews, and met him often then at Bankes's, (who was my collegiate pastor, and master, and patron,) and at Rhodes's, Milnes's, Price's, Dick's, Macnamara's, Farrell's, Galley Knight's, and other houses, (with whom I used to pass the day in riding and swimming,) and William Bankes, who was good-naturedly tolerant of my ferocities.

- It was not till 1807, after I had been upwards of a year away from Cambridge, to which I had returned again to reside for my degree, that I became one of Matthews's favorites, to whom he was affectionate, who, after hating me for two years, because I 'wore a white hat and a gray coat, and rode a gray horse,' (as he says himself,) took me into his good graces because I had worn a white silk that I had always lived a good deal, and got drunk occasionally, in their company; but now we became really friends in a morning. Matthews, however, was not at this period resident in college. I met him chiefly in London, and at uncertain periods at Cambridge. Hobhouse, in the mean time, did great things: he founded the Cambridge 'Whig Club,' (which he seems to have forgotten,) and the 'Amiable Society,' which was dissolved in consequence of the members constantly quarrelling, and made himself very popular with 'us youth,' and no less formidable to all tutors, professors, and heads of colleges. William Bankes was gone; while he stayed he ruled the roast, or rather the roasting, and was father of all mischiefs.

Matthews and I, meeting in London, and elsewhere, became great cronies. He was not good-tempered—not amiable—but with his term per was manageable, and I thought him so superior a man, that I was willing to sacrifice something to his humors, which were often, at the same time, amusing and provoking. What became of his pet, however, (and he cherished it till the time of his death,) was never known. I mention this by the way, fearing to skip it over, and as he wrote remarkably well, both in Latin and English. We went down to Cambridge a sort of adventurers, or, if you had a fancy, we were a famous cellar, and monkey dresses from a masquerade warehouse. We were a company of seven or eight, with an occasional neighbor or so for visitors, and used to sit up late in our friars' dresses, drinking Burgundy, claret, champagne, and what not, out of the skull-cup, and all sorts of glasses, and buffooning all round the house, in our conventional garments. Matthews always denominated me the 'Abbott,' and I was called by him my 'Abbott,' good humor, to the day of his death. The harmony of these our symposia was somewhat interrupted, a few days after our assembling, by Matthews's throwing a pillow at me. (as he was called, from winning a foot-match, and I from a match, the first from Ipswich to London, and the second from Brightmealstone,) by threatening to throw 'bold Webster out of a window, in consequence of his being a 'bold rabbit' and ending in this epigram. Webster came to me and said, that his respect and regard for me as host would not permit him to call out any of my guests, and that he should go to town next morning. He did. It was in vain that I represented to him that the window was not high, and that the turf under it was particularly soft. Away he went.

Matthews and myself had travelled down from London together, in a Gipsy fashion, in our garments, and he was the chief of the hut, and a very able writer, as is evident from the following passage, which is not here quoted, as it does not come under the single topic on which we were now engaged, and the humor of which I verily believe, that I owed to a portion of his good graces.

When at Newstead, somebody had an accident rub bed against him, and he got his stocking stuck in it, and would not let them go before dinner; of course the gentleman apologized.

'Sir,' answered Matthews, 'it may be all very well for you, who have a great many silk stockings, to dirty other people's; but to me, who have only this one pair, which I have put on in honor of the 'Abbott' here, no apology can compensate for such carelessness; besides the expense of washing.' He had the same sort of droll sardonic way about everything. A wild Irishman named F one evening beginning to say something at a large supper at Cambridge, Matthews roared out 'Silence!' and then, pointing to F, cried out, in the words of the oracle, 'Orson is endowed with reason.' You may easily imagine that Orson looked a little pale, and that his audience had acquired, on hearing this compliment. When Hobhouse published his volume of poems, the Miss Cellany, (which Matthews would call the Miss-cellany,) I all that could be drawn from him; yet the preface was 'extremely like Walsh.' Hobhouse thought this at first a compliment; but we never could make out what it was, for all we know of Walsh is his ode to King William, and Pope's epitaph of 'known Walsh.' When the party broke up for London, Hobhouse and Matthews, who were the greatest friends possible, agreed, for a whim, to walk together to town. They started on foot on the first day of their journey, the latter half of their journey, occasionally passing and repassing, without speaking. When Matthews had got to Highgate, he had spent all his money but threepence halfpenny, and determined to spend that also in a pint of beer, which I believe he was drinking before a public house, as Scrope passed him (still without speaking), for the last time on their route. They were recorcelled in London again.

'One of Matthew's passions was 'the Fancy;' and he spoke unconsciously of it always, though he would have been drowned if ever he came to a difficult pass in the water. He was so; but surely Scrope and myself would have been most heartily glad that '"The Dean had died,' And our prediction proved a lie.'

'His head was uncommonly handsome, very like what Pope's was in his youth.

'His voice, and laugh, and features are strongly resembled by his brother Henry's, if Henry be he King's College. His passion for business was so great, that he actually wanted me to match him with Dogherty, (whom I had backed and made the match for against Tom Belcher,) and I saw them spar to get the better of me, when, with his station in Pop's Alley. During the interval between the opera and the ballet, an acquaintance took his station by him, and saluted him; 'Come round,' said Matthews, 'come round,' 'Why should I come round?' said the other; 'you have only to turn your head—I am close by you.' That is exactly what I cannot do," answered Matthews: 'don't you see the state I am in?' pointing to his buckram shirt-collar, and inflexible cravat; and there he stood with his head always in the same perpendicular position during the whole spectacle.

'One evening, after dining together, as we were going to the opera, I happened to have a spare opera ticket, (I subscribed to a box,) and presented it to Matthews. 'Now sir,' said he to Hobhouse, afterward, 'this I call courtesy in the Abbe—another man would never have thought that I might do better with half a guinea to throw it to a door-keeper; but here is a man not only asks me to dinner, but gives me a ticket for the theatre.' These were only his oddities, for no man was more liberal, or more honorable in all his doings and dealings than Matthews. He gave Hobhouse and me, before we set out for Constantinople, a most splendid entertainment, to which we did ample justice. One of his fancies was dining at all sorts of out-of-the-way places. Sometimes people popped upon him, in I know not what coffee-house in the Strand—and what do you think was the attraction? Why, that he paid a shilling (I think) to dine with his hat on. This he called his 'hat-house,' and used to boast of the comfort of being covered at meal-times.

'When Sir Henry Smith was expelled from Cambridge for a row with a tradesman named Hiron,' said Matthews, "he solicited him to sit out under Hiron's windows every evening.

'Ah me! what pretty do's serious.
The men who meddle with hat Hiron.'

'He was also on of that band of profane scoffers, who, under the services of Mr. Scot, roused Mansel (late bishop of Bristol) from his slumbers in the lodge of Trinity, and when he appeared at the window foaming with wrath, and crying so, I know you, gentlemen, I know you; 'were went to reply, 'We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord—good Lord deliver us!' (Lort was his Christian name.) As he was very free in his speculations upon all kinds of subjects, although by no means either dissolute or intemperate in his conduct, and as I was no less independent, our conversation and correspondence used to alarm our friend Hobhouse to a considerable degree.

'You must be almost tired of my packets, which will have cost a mint of postage.

'Salute Gifford and all my friends,

'The Hints,' Hobhouse says, will require a good deal of slushing to suit the times, which will be a work of time, for I don't feel at all laborious just now. Whatever effect he are to have perhaps be greater in a separate form, and they also must have my name to them. Now, if you publish them in the same volume with Don Juan, they identify Don Juan as mine, which I don't think worth a chancy suit about my daughter's guardship, as in your present code a facetious poem is sufficient to take away a man's right over his family.

'Of the state of things here it would be difficult and not very prudent to speak at large, the Huns opening all letters. I wonder if they can read them when they have opened them; if so, they may see, in my most libidinous hand, that I think them damned scoundrels and barbarians, and their emperor a fool, and themselves more fools than he; all which they may send to Vienna for any thing that I care. They have got themselves masters of the Papal police, and are bullying away; but some day or other they will pay for all: it may not be very soon, because these unhappy Italians have no consistency among themselves; but I suppose that Providence will get tired of them at last.

'Yours, etc."

LETTER CCCCXLVII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Baroona, Dec. 9, 1823.

"Besides this letter, you will receive three packets, containing, in all, eighteen more sheets of Memoranda, which, I fear, will cost you more in postage than they will ever produce by being printed in the next century. Instead of writing a long letter, if you could not make anything of them, now the way of recession, (that is, after my death,) I should be very glad,—as, with all due regard to your progeny, I prefer you to your grandchildren. Wicks and Longman pretend tourry advance prayers, read them now, pleading themselfes not to have them published till after my decease, think you? and what say you?

"Over these latter sheets I would leave you a discretion power; because they contain, perhaps, a thing or two which is too sincere for the public. If I consent to your disposing of the reversion now, where would be the harm?" tastes may change. I would, in your case, make my essay to dispose of them, not publish, now; and if you (as is most likely) survive me, add what you please from your DWEL. knowledge, and, above all, contradicted any thing, if I have mis-stated; for my first object is the truth, even at my own expense: I shall do anything but permit the cardinal to carry up stairs into my own quarter. But it was too late, he was gone—not at all disfigured—bled inwardly—not above an out or two, and had the command to carry up stairs into my own quarter. The cardinals were all Tighe and examined him. He had been shot by cut balls, or slugs. I left one of the slugs, which had gone through him, all the skin. Every body conjectures why he was killed, but no one knows how. The gun was found close by him—an old gun, half filed down.

I have only said, O Dio! and Gesu! two or three times, and appeared to have suffered little. Poor fellow! he was a brave officer, but had made himself much disliked by the people. I knew him personally, and had met him often at conversations and elsewhere. My house is full of soldiers, dragoons, lieu tenants, priests, and all kinds of persons, though I have now cleared it, and clapped sentinels at the doors. To-morrow the body is to be moved. The town is in the greatest confusion, as you may suppose.

You are to know that, if I had not had the body moved, they would have left him there till morning in the street, for fear of consequences. I would not choose to let even a dog die in such a manner, without some medical man, for consoling me, I care for none in a duty.

Yours, &c.

P. S. The lieutenant on duty by the body is smoking his pipe with great composure. A queer people this.

LETTER CCCCLXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

Renaissa, Dec. 25, 1838.

You will or ought to have received the packet and letters which I remitted to you just past a fortnight ago, (or it may be more days,) and I shall be glad of an answer, as, in these times and places packets per post are in some risk of not reaching their destination.

I have been thinking of a project for you and me, in case we both get to London again, which (if a Neapolitan war don't suscitante) may be calculated as possible for one of us about the spring of 1821. We are all of us, with the exception of the young girl, too, will be on our own premises, and without doubt, and, as for companions, I care for none in a duty.

Yours, &c.

nal baked meats* which have coldly set forth the breakfast table of all Great Britain for so many years.

Now, my dear Mr. Moore, what do you think of this plan? I have made a draft, and recollect that, if we take to such an enterprise, we must do so in good earnest. Here is a hint,—do you make it a plan. We will modify it into a literary and classical a concern as you please, only let us make it a dingy one, and it will most likely succeed. But you must live in London, and I also, to bring it to bear, and we must keep it a secret.

For the living in London, I would make that not difficult to you, (if you would allow me,) until we could see whether one means or other (the success of this plan, for instance) would not make it quite easy for you, as well as for your family; and, in any case, we should have some fun, composing, correcting, supposing, inspecting, and supposing altogether over our lucubrations. If you think this worth a thought, let me know, and I will begin to lay in a small literary capital of composition for the occasion.

"Yours ever, affectionately,

B.

"P. S. If you thought of a middle plan between a Spectator and a newspaper, why not,—only not on a Sunday. Nor that Sunny would not be an excellent day, but is engaged already. We will call it the 'Tenda Rossa,' the name Tassoni gave an answer of his in a controversy, in allusion to the delirious hint of Timour the Lame, to his enemies, by his voice, before he gave battle. Or, we will call it 'GI,' or 'I Carbonari,' if it so please you—or any other name full of 'pastime and prodigality,' which you may prefer."

Let me have an answer. I conclude poetically, with the bellman, 'A merry Christmas to you!'"

ADDRESS TO THE NEAPOLITAN GOVERNMENT.

"An Englishman, a friend to liberty, having understood that the Neapolitans permit even foreigners to contribute to the good cause, is desirous that they should do him the honor of accepting a thousand guineas under his name, by way of offering. Having already, not long since, been an ocular witness of the despotism of the barbarians in the States occupied by them in Italy, he sees, with the enthusiasm natural to a cultivated man, the generous determination of the Neapolitans to assert their well-worn independence. As a member of the English House of Peers, he would be a traitor to the principles which placed the reigning family of England on the throne, if he were not grateful for the noble lesson so lately given both to people and to kings. The offer which he desires to make is small in itself, as must always be that presented from an individual to a nation; but he trusts that it will not be the last they will receive from their countrymen. His distance from the frontier, and the feeling of his personal incapacity to contribute efficaciously to the service of the nation, prevents him from proposing himself as worthy of the lowest commission, for which experience and talent might be requisite. But if, as a mere volunteer, his presence were not a burden to whomsoever he might serve, he thinks it much about them to whatever place the Neapolitan government might point out, there to obey the orders and participate in the dangers of his commanding officer, without any other motive than that of showing the destiny of a brave nation, defending itself against the self-called Holy Alliance, which but combines the vice of hypocrisy with despotism"

LETTER CCCCXX
TO MR. MOORE.

"Yours entering into my project for the Memoir is pleasant to me. But I doubt (contrary to my dear Madame de Stael's opinion) of its being always shall—not only because I really did feel attached to her personally, but because she and about a dozen others of that sex were all who stood by me in the grand undertaking; and, indeed, I had rather it did not, for a man always looks dead after his Life has appeared, and I should certify not survive the appearance of mine. The first part I cannot consent to alter, even although Madame de Stael's opinion of Benjamin Constant, and my remarks upon Lady Caroline's beauty, (which is surely great, and I suppose that I have said so—at least I ought,) should go down to our grandchildren in unsophisticated nakedness.

"As to Madame de Stael, I am by no means bound to be her beadman—she was always more civil to me in person than during my absence. Our dear defunct friend, Matthew Lewis, who was too great a bore ever to lie, assured me, upon his tiresome word of honor, that, at Florence, the said Madame de Stael was open-mouthed against me; and, when, as an instance of her, I changed her opinion, replied, with laid-back sincerity, that I had named her in a sonnet with Voltaire, Rousseau, &c., &c., and that she could not help it, through decency. Now, I have forgotten this, but I have been generous,—as mine acquaintance, the late Captain Whitby of the navy, used to say to his seamen (when 'married to the gunner's daughter')—two dozen, and let you off easy. The two dozen were with the 'nine-tails;' 'let off easy' was rather his own opinion than that of the patient.

"My acquaintance with these terms and practices arises from my having been much conversant with ships of war and naval heroes in the years of my voyages in the Mediterranean. Whitby was in the gallant action off Lissa in 1811. He was brave, but a disciplinarian. When he left his frigate, he left a parrot, which was taught by the crew the following sounds—(It must be remarked that Captain Whitby was the image of Fawsett the actor in voice, face, and figure, and that he squalled.)"

"'Whitby! Whitby! funny eye! funny eye! two dozen, and let you off easy. Oh you — !'

"Now, if Madame de B. has a parrot, it had better be taught a French parody of the same sounds—'I wish exactly as you do about our 'art,' but it comes over me in a kind of rage every now and then, like — an — and, then, if I don't write to empty my mind, I go mad. As to that word 'regular,' which is taught by the writer, which you describe in your friend, I do not understand it. I feel it as a torture, which I must get rid of, but never as a pleasure. On the contrary, I think composition a great pain."

"I wish you would think seriously of the journal scheme—for I am as serious as one can be, in this world, about any thing. As to matters here, they are high and mighty—but not for paper. It is not that I think so much about them, but whatever place the Neapolitan government might point out, there to obey the orders and participate in the dangers of his commanding officer, without any other motive than that of showing the destiny of a brave nation, defending itself against the self-called Holy Alliance, which but combines the vice of hypocrisy with despotism"
Europe. There is nothing like habit in these things. "I shall remain here till May or June, and, unless 'honor comes unlooked for,' we may perhaps meet, in France or England, within the year." Yours, &c.

"Of course, I cannot explain to you existing circumstances, as they open all letters. "Will you set me right about your cursed 'Champs Elysées'-are they 'es' or 'ées' for the adjective? I know nothing of French, being all Italian. Though I can read it, I cannot understand French, I never attempt to speak it; for I hate it. From the second part of the Memoirs cut out what you please.

LETTER CCCCLXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"London, January 4, 1821.

I just see, by the papers of Galighini, that there is a new tragedy of great extent, adapted to the taste of Barry Cornwall. Of what I have read of his works I liked the Dramatic Sketches, but thought his Sicilian story and Marcin Colonna, in rhyme, quite spoiled, by I know not what addition. I think Mr. Wordsworth, and Moore, and myself, am all mixed up into a kind of chaos. I think him very likely to produce a good tragedy, if he keep to a natural style, and not play tricks to form harlequinades for an audience. As he (Barry Cornwall) is not his true name, was a schoolfellow of mine, I take more than common interest in his success, and shall be glad to hear of it speedily. If I had been aware that he was in that line, I should have spoken of him in the preface to Marino Faliero. He will do a world's wonder if he produce a great tragedy. I am, however, persuaded, that this is not to be done by following the old dramatists,—who are all full of gross faults, pardoned only for the beauty of their language,—but by writing naturally and regularly, and producing regular tragedies, like the Greeks; but not in imitation,—merely the outline of their conduct, adapted to our own times and circumstances, and of course no chorus.

"You will laugh, and say, 'Why don't you do so?' I have, you see, tried a sketch in Marino Faliero; but many people think my talent 'essential.' They don't say it, but I am not able to see that they are not right. If Marino Faliero don't fall—In the perusal—I shall, perhaps, try again, (but not for the stage); and as I think that love is not the principal passion for tragedy, (and yet most of ours, turn upon it,) you will not find me a popular writer. Unless it is love, furious, criminal, and hopeless, it ought not to make a tragic subject. When it is melting and mandlin, it does, but it ought not to do it then for the gallery and second-price boxes.

"If you want to have a notion of what I am trying, take up a translation of any of the Greek tragedians. If I said the original, it would be an impudent presumption of mine; but the translations are so inferior to the originals that I think I may risk it. Then judge of the 'simplicity of plot,' &c., and do not judge me by your old mad dramatists, which is like drinking usquebaugh and then proving a fountain. Yet, after all, I suppose that you do not mean that spirits is a nobler element than a clear spring bubbling in the sun, and this I take to be the difference between the Greeks and those turbid mountebanks—always excepting Ben Johnson, who was a scholar and a classic. Or, take up a translation of Alfieri, and try the interest, &c., of these my new attempts in the old line, by him in English; and then tell me fairly your opinion. But don't measure me by your own old or new tailors' yards. Nothing so easy as intricate confusion of plot and rant. Mrs. Centlivre, in comedy, has ten times the bustle of Congreve; but are they to be compared? and yet she drove Congreve from the theatre."

LETTER CCCCLXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"London, January 19, 1821.

"Yours of the 29th ultimo hath arrived. I must really and seriously request that you will beg of Messrs. Harris or Elliston to let the Doge alone: it is not an acting play; it will not serve their purpose; it will destroy yours, (the sale); and it will distress me. It is not courteous, it is hardly even gentlemanly, to persist in this appropriation of a man's writings to their mountebanks.

"I have already sent you by last post a short protest to the Duke, (against the publication?) in case that they persist, which I trust that they will not, you must then publish it in the newspapers. I shall not let them off with that only, if they go on; but make a prolix speech on that subject of Wordsworth, and Moore, and myself; and I think the injustice of their mode of behavior. It is hard that I should have all the buffoons in Britain to deal with—pirates who will publish, and players who will act—when there are thousands of worthy men who neither get bookseller nor manager for love nor money.

"You never answered me a word about Galighini. If you mean to use the two document, do; if not, burn them. I do not choose to leave them in any one's possession; suppose some one found them without the letters, what would they think? why, that I had been doing the opposite of what I have done, to wit, referred the whole thing to you—an act of civility, at least, which required saying, 'I have received your letter.' I thought that you might have some hold upon those publications by this means; to me it can be no interest one way or the other.

"The third canto of Don Juan is 'dull,' but you must really put up with it: if the first two and the two following are tolerable, what do you expect particularly as I neither dispute with you on it as a matter of criticism or as a matter of business.

"Besides, what am I to understand? you, and Douglas Kinnaird, and others, write to me, that the first two published cantos are among the best that I ever wrote, and are reckoned so; Augusta writes that they are thought 'executionable' (bitter word that for an author—eh, Murray?) as a composition even, and that she had heard so much against them that she would never read them and never has. Be that as it may, I can't alter it: this is not my forte. If you publish the three canto ones without ostentation, they may perhaps succeed.

"Pray publish the Dante and the Puleis. (The Prophecy of Luna, I mean.) I look upon the Puleis as my grand performance. The remainder of the Hints, where be they? Now, bring them all out about the same time, otherwise 'the variety' you want of will be lost.

"I am in bad humor:—some obstructions in business with those plague trustees, who object to an advantageous loan which I was to furnish to a nobleman on mortgage because his property is in Ireland, have shown me how a man is treated in his absence. Oh, if I do come back, I will make those who little dream of it spin,—or they cr shall go down."

"Yours, &c.

See Don Juan, canto X, stanza 15.
LETTER CCCCLXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"January 30, 1821.

"I did not think to have troubled you with the plague and postage of a double letter this time, but I have just read in an Italian paper, 'That Lord Byron has a tragedy coming out,' &c., &c., and that the Courier and Morning Chronicle, &c., &c., are pulling one another to pieces about him.

"Now I do reiterate and desire, that every thing may be done to prevent it from coming out on any theatre, for which it never was designed, and on which (in the present state of the stage of London) it could never succeed. I have sent you my appeal last post, which you must publish in case of need; and I require you even in your own name (if my honor is dear to you) to declare that such representation would be contrary to my wish and to my judgment. If you do not wish to drive me mad altogether, you will hit upon some way to prevent this.

"P. S. I cannot conceive how Harris or Elliston should be so insane as to think of acting Marine Falerio; they might as well act the Prometheus of Æschylus. I speak of course humbly, and with the greatest sense of the distance of time and merit between the two performances; but merely to show the absurdity of the attempt.

"The Italian paper speaks of a 'party against it;' to be sure there would be a party. Can you imagine, that after having never flattered man, nor beast, nor opinion, nor politics, there would not be a party against a man, who is also a popular writer—at least a successful? Why, all parties would be a party against.'

LETTER CCCCLXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Revueux, January 30, 1821.

"If Harris or Elliston persist, after the remonstrance which I desired you and Mr. Kinnaird to make on my behalf, and which I hope will be sufficient—but if I say, they do persist, then I wish you to present in person the enclosed letter to the Lord Chamberlain: I have said in person, because otherwise I shall have neither answer nor knowledge that it has reached its address, owing to the 'insolence of office.'

"I wish you would speak to Lord Holland, and to all my friends and yours, to interest themselves in preventing this cursed attempt at representation. 'God help me at this distance, I am treated like a corpse or a fool by the few people that I thought I could rely upon; and I was a fool to think any better of them than of the rest of mankind.'

"Pray write. Yours, &c.

"P. S. I have nothing more at heart (that is, in literature) than to prevent this drama from going upon the stage in short, rather than permit it, it must be suppressed altogether, and only forty copies struck off for presents to my friends. What cursed fools those speculating buoions must be to not to see that it is unfit for their fair—or their both.'

LETTER CCCCLXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Revueux, January 27, 1821.

"I differ from you about the Dante, which I think should be published with the tragedy. But do as you please: you must be the best judge of your own craft. I agree with you about the title. The play may be good or bad, but I flatter myself that it is original as a picture of that kind of passion, which to my mind is so natural, that I am convinced that I should have done precisely what the Doge did on those provocations.

"I am glad of Poscollo's approbation.

"Excuse haste. I believe I mentioned to you that—I forgot what it was, but no matter.

"Thanks for your compliments of the year. I hope that it will be pleasant. The whole to speak with reference to England only, as far as regards myself, where I had every kind of disappointment—lost an important lawsuit—and the trustees of Lady Byron refusing to allow of an advantageous loan to be made from their property to Lord Blessington, &c., &c., by way of closing the four seasons. These, and a hundred other such things, made a year of bitter business for me in England. Luckily, things were a little pleasant for me here, else I should have taken the liberty of Hannibal's ring.
LETTER CCCCLXXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, February 2, 1821.

"Your letter of excuses has arrived. I receive the letter, but do not admit the excuses, except in courtesy, as when a man treads on your toes and bogs your pardon the pardon is granted, but the joint aches, especially if there be a corn upon it. However, I shall scold you presently.

"In the last speech of the Doge, there occurs (I think from memory) the phrase—

"And who makes and unmakes wars!"

change this to—

that is to say, if the verse runs equally well, and Mr. Gifford thinks expression improved. Pray have the bounty to attend to this. You are grown quite a minister of state. Mind if some of these days you are not thrown out.  will not be always a Tory, though Johnson says the first Whig was the devil.

"You have learned one secret from Mr. Galignani's (somewhat tardily acknowledged) correspondence: this is, that an English author may dispose of his exclusive copyright in France,—a fact of some consequence (in time of peace) in the case of a popular writer. Now I will tell you what you shall do, and take no advantage of you, though you were carry enough never to acknowledge my letter for three months. Offer Galignani the refusal of the copyright in France; if he refuses, appoint any bookseller in France you please, and I will sign any assignment you please, and it shall never cost you a sou on my account.

"Recollect that I have nothing to do with it, except as far as it may secure the copyright to yourself. I will have no bargain but with the English booksellers, and I desire no interest out of that country.

"Now, that's fair and open, and a little hand-somer than your dogging silence, to see what would come of it. You are an excellent fellow, mio caro Murray, but there is still a little leaven of Fleet street about you now and then—a crumb of the old loaf. You have no right to act suspiciously with me, for I have given you no reason. I shall always be frank with you; as, for instance, whenever you talk with the votaries of Apollo aritmetically, in guineas, not pounds—to poets, as well as physicians, and bidders at auctions.

"I shall say no more at present, save that I am yours, &c."

"P.S. If you venture, as you say, to Ravenna this year, I will exercise the rites of hospitality while you live, and bury you handsomely, (though not in holy ground,) if you get 'shot or slashed in a creagh or spilore,' which are frequent hereof last among the native parties. But perhaps your visit may be anticipated; I may probably come to your country; in which case write to her ladyship the duplicate of the epistle the king of France wrote to Prince John."
Naples, and if they lose a single battle, all Italy will be up. It will be like the Spanish row, if they have any bottom.

"What are they up to?"—to be sure they are; and that's the reason why I always put in my opinion of the German Austrian scoundrels. There is no Italian who loathes them more than I do; and whatever I could do to ruin Italy and the earth of their infamous oppression would be done con amore.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCCLXXIX.

"Ravenna, Feb. 21, 1821."

"In the forty-fourth page, volume first, of Turner's Travels, (which you lately sent me,) it is stated that 'Lord Byron, when he expressed such confidence of its practicability, seems to have forgotten (as, indeed, may be seen in the Italian edition) that the tide is not driven by the force of the current, but by the wind. Mr. Ekenhead and myself were on our way to the West End, and the other in an hour and twenty minutes. The tide was not in our favor; on the contrary, the great difficulty was to bear up against the current, which, so far from helping us, was working against us, and we were driven towards the Archipelago. Neither Mr. Ekenhead, myself, nor I, would venture to add, any person on board the frigate, from Captain Bathurst downwards, had any notion of the difference of the current on the Asiatic side, of which Mr. Turner speaks. I never heard of it till this moment, or I would have taken the other course. Lieutenant Ekenhead's sole motive, and mine also, for setting out from the European side, was that the little cape above Seatos was a more prominent starting-place, and the frigate, which lay below, close under the Asiatic castle, formed a better point of view for us to swim towards; and, in fact, we landed immediately below it."

"Mr. Turner says, 'Whatever is thrown into the stream on this part of the European bank, must arrive at the Asiatic shore.' This is so far from being the case that if you get out of the Archipelago, if left to the current, although a strong wind in the Asiatic direction might have such an effect occasionally."

"Mr. Turner attempted the passage from the Asiatic side, and failed. 'After two and twenty minutes, in which he did not advance a hundred yards, he gave it up from complete exhaustion.' This is very possible, and might have occurred to him in the case of the valley on the European side; he should have set out a couple of miles higher, and could then have come out below the European castle. I particularly stated, and Mr. Hobhouse has done so also, that we were obliged to make the real passage of one mile extend to between three and four, owing to the force of the stream. I can assure Mr. Turner, that his success would have given me great pleasure, as it would have added some more instances to the proofs of the probability. It is not quite fair in him to infer, that he failed, Leander could not succeed. There are still four instances on record: a Neapolitan, a young Jew, Mr. Ekenhead, and myself: the last done in the presence of hundreds of English witnesses."

"With regard to the difference of the current, I perceived none; it is favorable to the swimmer on the Asiatic side, however, and his stomach would have brought him into the sea, a considerable way above the opposite point of the coast which the swimmer wishes to make, but still bearing up against it; it is strong, but if you could swim well, you might reach and."
starting,' is only good for indifferent swimmers; a man of any practice or skill will always consider the distance less than the strength of the stream. If Ekenhead and myself had thought of crossing at the narrowest point, instead of going up to the Cape above it, we should have been swept down to Tenedos. The strait, however, is not so extremely wide even where it broadens above and below the forts. As the frigate was stationed some time in the Danubian waters waiting for the firman, I bathed often in the strait subsequent to the project, and generally on the Asiatic side, without perceiving the greater strength of the opposite stream by which the diplomatic traveller palliates his own failure. Our amusement in the small bay which opens immediately below the Asiatic fort was to dive for the land tortoises, which we flung in on purpose, as they amphibiously crawled along the bottom. This does not argue any greater violence of current than on the European shore. With regard to the modest inscription that we chose the European side as 'easier,' I appeal to Mr. Hobhouse and Captain Bathurst if it be true or not, (poor Ekenhead, being since exiled!) Had we been aware of any such difference of current as is asserted, we would at least have proved it, and were not likely to have given it up in the twenty-five minutes of Mr. Turner's own experiment. The secret of this is, that Mr. Turner failed, and that we succeeded; and he is consequently disappointed, and seems not unwilling to overshadow whatever little merit there might be in our success. Why did he not try the European side? If he had succeeded there, after failing on the Asiatic, his plea would have been more graceful and gracious. Mr. Turner may find what fault he pleases with my poetry, or my politics; but I recommend him to leave aquaduct reflections till he is able to swim five-and-twenty minutes 'without being exhausted,' though I believe he is the first modern Tory who ever swam against the stream for half the time."

LETTER CCCLXXX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, Feb. 2d, 1821.

"As I wish the soul of the late Antoine Gallignani to rest in peace, (you will have read his death published by himself, in his own newspaper,) you are requested particularly to inform his children and heirs, that of their 'Literary Gazette,' to which I subscribed more than two months ago, I have only received one number, notwithstanding I have written to them repeatedly. If they have no regard for me, a subscriber, they ought to have some for their deceased parent, who is undoubtedly no better off in his present residence for his total want of attention.

"If not, let me have my frances. They were paid by Missaglia, the Venetian bookseller. You may also hint to them that when a gentleman writes a letter, it is usual to send an answer. If not, I shall make them 'a speech,' which will comprise an apology on the deceased.

"We are here full of war, and within two days of the seat of it, expecting intelligence momentarily. We shall now see if our Italian friends are good for any thing but 'shooting round a corner,' like the 'Prize's' gun. Excuse haste, I write with my spurs putting on. My horses are at the door, and an Italian Count waiting to accompany me in my ride."

"Yours, &c.

"P. S. Pray, among my letters, did you get one detailing the death of the commandant here? He was killed near my door, and died in my house."
Dearest Moray,

In my packet of the 12th instant, in the last sheet, omit the sentence which (defining, or attempting to define, what and who are gentlemen) begins 'I should say that at least in life that most military men have it, and few women' to the end of the paragraph. I have several men of rank have it, a few lawyers,' &c., &c. I say, omit the whole of the sentence, because, like the 'cosmogony, or creation of the world,' in the ' Vicar of Wakefield,' it is not much to the purpose.

In the sentence above, too, almost at the top of the same page, after the words 'that there ever was, or can be, an aristocracy of poets,' add and insert these words—'I do not mean that they should write in the style of the song by a person of quality, or parle euphuism but there is a nobility of thought and expression to be found no less in Shakespeare, Pope, and Burns, than in Dante, Alfieri, &c., &c., and so on. Or, if you please, perhaps you had better omit the whole of the latter digression on the vulgar poets, and insert only as far as the end of the sentence on Pope's Homer, where I prefer it to Cowper's and quote Dr. Clarke in favor of its accuracy.

Upon all these points, take an opinion; take the sense (or nonsense) of your learned visitants, and act thereby. I am very tractable in this. Whether I have made out the case for Pope, I know not; but I am very sure that I have been zealous in the attempt. If it comes to the proofs, we shall beat the blackguards. I will show more imagery in twenty lines of Pope than in any equal length of words in English poetry, and in places where they least expect it. For instance, in his line on Sposis, now, do just read them over—the subject is of no consequence (whether it be satire or epic)—we are talking of poetry and imagery from nature and art. Now mark the images separately and arithmetically:

1. The thing of silk.
2. Curd of ass's milk.
3. The butterfly.
4. The wheel.
5. Bug with gilded wings.
7. Whose buzz.
8. Well-lived spaniels.
10. Flerid impotence.
11. Prompter, Puppet squeaks.
12. The ear of Eve.
13. Familiar tynd.
15. Pop at the toilet.
16. Flatterer at the board.
17. Amphibious thing.
18. Nor Gavin a lady.
20. A cherub's face.
21. A reptile all the rest.
22. The Rivals.
23. Pride that ticks the dust—

Deny that this stokes you, poets that some will trust, Wit that can creep, and pride that ticks the dust.'

Now, is there a line of all the passage without the most forcible imagery, (for his purpose?) Look at the variety—at the poetry of the passage—at the imagination; there is hardly a line from which a poet could make one that would be nothing in comparison with his higher passages in the Essay on Man, and many of his other poems, serious and comic. There never was such an unjust outcry in this world as that which these fellows are trying against Pope.

Ask Mr. Gilford, if in the fifth act of 'The Doge,' when the curtain is down (where the sentence of the Veil is passed) to insert the following lines in Marino Faliero's answer?

But let it be so. It will be in vain:
The veil which blackness o'er this blighted name,
A shroud, or screen to hide, these horrid points,
Shall draw more guars than the thousand portraits
Which painter could it in their painted trappings,
Your desertedClose—the people's crys.

Yours truly, &c.

P. S. Upon public matters here I say little; you will all hear soon enough of a general row throughout Italy. There never was a more foolish step than the expedition to Naples by these fellows.

I wish to propose to Holmes, the miniature painter, to come out to me this spring. I will pay him his expenses, and any sum in reason. I wish him to take my daughter's picture, (who is in a convent), and the Countess G.'s, and the head of a peasant girl, which latter would make a study for Raphael. It is a complete peasant face, but an Italian peasant's and quite in the Raphael Farnesina style. Her figure is tall, but rather large, and not at all comparable with her face, which is really superb. She is not seventeen, and I am anxious to have her face while it lasts. Madame G. is also very handsome, but 'tis quite in a different style—completely blonde and fair—very uncommon in Italy; yet not an English fairness, but more likely a Sveele or a Norwegian. Her figure, too, particularly the bust, is uncommonly good. It must be Holmes: I like him because he takes such inveterate likenesses. There is a war here, but a solitary traveller, with but little baggage, and nothing to do with politics, has nothing to fear. Pack him up in the diligence. Don't forget.'

Letter CcccLXXXIV

TO MR. HOPPNER.

Thanks for the translation. I have sent you some books, which I do not know whether you have read or no—you need not return them, if any case. I enclose you also a letter from Pisa. I have neither spared trouble nor expense in the care of the child; and as she was now four years old complete, and quite above the control of the servants—and as a man living without any woman at the head of his house cannot much attend to a nursery—I had no resource but to place her for a time (at a high pension too) in the convent of Bagna-Cavalli, (twelve miles off), where the air is good, and where she will, at least, have her learning advanced, and her morals and religion inculcated. I had also another reason—things were and are in such a state here, that I had no reason to look upon my own personal safety as particularly ensurable; and I thought the infant best out of harm's way for the present.

It is also fit that I should add that I by no means intended, or intend, to give a natural child an English education, because with the disadvantages of her birth, her after-settlement would be doubly difficult. Abroad, with a fair foreign education and a portion of five or six thousand pounds, she might and may marry very respectably. In England she could not be the same; she would be nobody, while elsewhere it is a fortune. It is, besides, my wish that she should be a Roman Catholic, which I look upon as the best religion, as it is assuredly the old

"You know my opinion of that second-hand school of poetry. You also know my high opinion of your own poetry,—because it is of no school. I read Cenci—but, besides that I think the subject essentially undramatic, I am not an admirer of our old dramatists, as models. I deny that the English have hitherto had a drama at all. Your Cenci, however, was a work of power and poetry. As to my drama, pray revenge yourself upon it, I being as free as I have been with yours.

"I have just got your Prometheans, which I long to see. I have heard nothing of mine, and do not know that it is yet published. I have published a pamphlet on the Pope controversy, which you will not like. Had I known that Keats was dead—or that he was alive and so sensitive—I should have omitted some remarks upon his poetry, to which I was provoked by his attack upon Pope, and my disapprobation of his own style of writing.

"You want me to undertake a great poem,—I have not the inclination nor the power. As I grow older, the indifference—not to life, for we love it by instinct—but to the stimuli of life, increases. Besides, this late failure of the Italians has lately disappointed me for many reasons,—some public, some personal. My respects to Mrs. S.

"Yours ever.

"P. S. Could not you and I contrive to meet this summer? Could not you take a run here above?"

LETTER CCCCLXXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, April 21, 1821.

I enclose you another letter on Bowles. But I premise that it is not like the former, and that I am not at all sure how much, if any, of it should be published. Upon this point you can consult with Mr. Gifford, and think twice before you publish it at all.

"Yours truly.

"B.

"P. S. You may make my subscription for Mr. Scott's widow, &c., thirty instead of the proposed ten pounds; but do not put down my name, put down N. N. only. The reason is, that, as I have mentioned him in the enclosed pamphlet, it would look indecent. I would give more, but my disapprobation last year about Rochdale and the transfer of the funds render me more economical for the present."

LETTER CCCCLXXXVI.

TO MR. SHELEY.

"Ravenna, April 26, 1821.

The child continues doing well, and the accounts are regular and favorable. It is gratifying to me that you and Mrs. Shelley do not disapprove of the step which I have taken, which is merely temporary.

"I am very sorry to hear what you say of Keats—is it actually true? I did not think criticism had been so killing. Though I differ from you essentially in your estimate of his performances, I so much abhor all unnecessary pain, that I would rather he had been seated on the highest peak of Parnassus than have perished in such a manner. Poor fellow! though with such inordinate self-love he would probably have not been very happy. I read the review of 'Endymion' in the Quarterly. It was severe,—but surely not so severe as my reviews in that and other journals upon others.

"I recollect the effect on me of the Edinburgh on my first poem; it was rage, and resistance, and redress—but not despondency nor despair. I grant that those are not amiable feelings; but, in this world of bustle and broil, and especially in the career of writing, a man should calculate upon his powers of resistance before he goes into the arena.

"You know my opinion of that second-hand school of poetry. You also know my high opinion of your own poetry,—because it is of no school. I read Cenci—but, besides that I think the subject essentially undramatic, I am not an admirer of our old dramatists, as models. I deny that the English have hitherto had a drama at all. Your Cenci, however, was a work of power and poetry. As to my drama, pray revenge yourself upon it, I being as free as I have been with yours.

"I have just got your Prometheans, which I long to see. I have heard nothing of mine, and do not know that it is yet published. I have published a pamphlet on the Pope controversy, which you will not like. Had I known that Keats was dead—or that he was alive and so sensitive—I should have omitted some remarks upon his poetry, to which I was provoked by his attack upon Pope, and my disapprobation of his own style of writing.

"You want me to undertake a great poem,—I have not the inclination nor the power. As I grow older, the indifference—not to life, for we love it by instinct—but to the stimuli of life, increases. Besides, this late failure of the Italians has lately disappointed me for many reasons,—some public, some personal. My respects to Mrs. S.

"Yours ever.

"P. S. Could not you and I contrive to meet this summer? Could not you take a run here above?"

LETTER CCCCLXXXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, April 28, 1821.

I sent you by last postis a large packet, which will not do for publication, (I suspect,) being, as the apprentices say, 'dammed low.' I put off also for a week or two sending the Italian scrap which will form a note to it. The reason is, that letters being opened, I wish to 'hide a weast.'

"Well, have you published the tragedy? and does the letter take?

"Is it true what Shelley writes me, that poor John Keats is at Rome on one of the Quarterly Review? I am very sorry for it, though I think he took the wrong line as a poet, and was spoiled by Cockney fying, and suborning, and versifying Tooke's Pantheon and Lemppriere's Dictionary. I know, by experience, that a savage review is hemlock to a sucking author; and the one on me (which produced the English Barbs, &c.) knocked me down—but I got up again. Instead of bursting a blood vessel, I drank three bottles of claret, and began an answer, finding that there was nothing in the article for which I could lawfully knock Jeffrey on the head, in an honorable way. However, I would not be the person who wrote the homicidal article for all the honor and glory in the world, though I had no means approve of that school of scribbling which it treats upon.

"You see the Italians have made a sad business of it—all owing to treachery and disunion among themselves. It has given me great vexation. The executions heaped upon the Neapolitans by the other Italians are quite in unison with those of the rest of Europe.

"P. S. Your latest packet of books is on its way here, but not arrived. Kenilworth excellent. Thanks for the pocket-books, of which I have made presents to those ladies who like cuts, and land scapes, and all that. I have got an Itilian book of two which I should like to send you if I had an opportunity.
I am not at present in the very highest health, Spring, probably; so I have lowered my diet and taken to Epson salts.

"As you say my prose is good, why don't you treat with Moore for the reversion of the Memoirs? conditionally, recollect; not to be published before decease. He has the permission to dispose of them, and I advised him to do so."

LETTER CCCCLXXXVIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravens, April 26, 1821."

"You cannot have been more disappointed than myself, nor so much deceived. I have been so at some personal risk also, which is not yet done away with.

"Hme more circumstances shall alter my tone nor my feelings of indignation against tyranny triumphant. The present business has been as much a work of treachery as of cowardice, though both may have done their part. If ever you and I meet again, I will have a talk with you upon the subject. At present, for obvious reasons, I can write but little, as all letters are opened. In mine they shall always find my sentiments, but nothing that can lead to the oppression of others.

"You will please to recollect that the Neapolitans are nowhere now more executed than in Italy, and not blame a whole people for the vices of a province. That would be like condemning Great Britain because they plunder wrecks in Cornwall.

"And now let us be literary; - a sad falling off, but it is always a consolation. If 'Othello's occupation' be gone, let us take to the next best; and if we cannot contribute to make mankind more free and wise, we may amuse ourselves and those who like it. What are you writing? I have been scribbling at intervals, and Murray will be publishing about now.

"Lady Noel has, as you say, been dangerously ill; but it may console you to learn that she is dangerously well again.

"I have written a sheet or two more of Memo-randa for you; and I kept a little journal for about a month or two, till I had filled the paper-book. I then left it off, as things grew busy, and, afterward, too gloomy to set down without a painful feeling. This I should be glad to send you, if I had an opportunity; but a volume, however small, don't go well by such posts as exist in this inquisition of a country.

"I have no news. As a very pretty woman said to me a few nights ago, with the tears in her eyes, as she sat at the harpsichord, 'Alas! the Italians must now return to making opera.' I fear that and macaroni are their forte, and 'molly their only wear.' However, there are some high spirits among them still. Pray write, "And believe me, &c."

LETTER CCCCLXXXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravens, May 3, 1821."

"Though I wrote to you on the 28th ultimo, I must acknowledge yours of this day, with the lines. They are sublime, as well as beautiful, and in your very best mood and manner. They are also but too true. However, do not confound the coudrels at the heel of the boot with their letters at the top of it. I assure you that there are some loftier spirits.

"Nothing, however, can better than your poem or more deserve by the lazzaroni. They are now abhorred and disclaimed nowhere more than here. We will talk over these things (if we meet) some day, and I will recount my own adventures, some of which have been a little hazardous, perhaps.

"So you have got the letter on Bowles? I do not recollect to have said any thing of you that could offend,—certainly, nothing intentionally. As for *, I meant him a compliment. I wrote the whole off-hand, without copy or correction, and expecting then every day to be called into the field. What have I said of you? I am sure I forget. It must be something of regret for your approbation of Bowles. And did you not approve, as he says? Would I had known that before! I would have given him some more gruel. My intention was to make fun of all these fellows; but how I succeeded, I don't know.

"As to Pope, I have always regarded him as the greatest name in our poetry. Depend upon it, the rest are barbarians. He is a Greek Temple, with a Gothic Cathedral on one hand, and a Turkish Mosque and all sorts of fantastic pagodas and conventicles about him. You may call Shakspeare and Milton pyramids, if you please, but I prefer the Temple of Theseus or the Parthenon to a mountain of burnt brick-work.

"The Murray has written to me but once, the day of its publication, when it seemed prosperous. But I have heard of late from England but rarely. Of Murray's other publications (of mine) I know nothing, nor whether he has published. He was to have done so a month ago. I wish you would do something, or that we were together.

"Ever yours and affectionately, "B"

LETTER CCCXC.

"Ravens, May 10, 1821."

"I have just got your packet. I am obliged to Mr. Bowles, and Mr. Bowles is obliged to me, for having restored him to good humor. He is to write, and you to publish, what you please,—motto and subject. I desire nothing but fair play for all parties. Of course, after the new tone of Mr. Bowles you will not publish my defence of Gilchrist: it would be brutal to do so after his urbanity, for it is rather too rough, like his own attack upon Gilchrist. You may tell him what I say there of his Missionary (it is praised, as it deserves.) However, and if there are any passages not personal to Bowles, and yet bearing upon the question, you may add them to the reprint (if it is reprinted) of my first letter to you. Upon this consult Gilford; and, above all, don't let any thing be added which can personally affect Mr. Bowles.

"In the enclosed notes, of course, what I say of the democracy of poetry cannot apply to Mr. Bowles, but to the Cockney and water washing-tub schools.

"I hope and trust that Elliston won't be permitted to act the drams! Surely he might have the grace to wait for Kean's return before he attempted it; though Murray then, I should be as much against the attempt as ever.

"I have got a small packet of books, but neither Waldegrave, Oxford, nor Scott's novels am among them. Where didn't you republish Hudgiton's Childe Harold's Monitor and Latino-mastix? they are excellent. Think of this,—they are all for Pope. "Yours, &c."
LETTER COLCXC.

TO MR. HOPPER.

"Raynham, May 11, 1821.

If I had but known your notion about Switzer,... before I should have adopted it at once. As it is, I shall let the child remain in her convent, where she seems healthy and happy, for the present; but I shall feel much obliged if you will inquire, when you are in the cantons, about the usual and best form of education suitable for females, and let me know the result of your opinions. It is some consolation that both Mr. and Mrs. Shelley have written to approve entirely my placing the child with the nuns for the present. I can refer to my whole conduct, as having neither spared care, kindness, nor expense, since the child was sent to me. The people may say what they please, I must content myself with not deserving (in this instance) that they should speak ill.

"The place is a country town, in a good air, where there is a large establishment for education, and many children, some of considerable rank, placed in it. As a country town, it is less liable to objections of every kind. It has always appeared to me, that the moral defect in Italy does not proceed from a conventional education,—because, to my certain knowledge, they came out of their convents innocent even to ignorance of moral evil,—but to the state of society into which they are directly plunged on coming out of it. It is like educating an infant on a mountain-top, and then taking him to the sea and throwing him into it and desiring him to swim. The evil, however, though still greater, is partly wearing away, as the women are more permitted to marry from attachment; this is, I believe, the case also in France. And, after all, what is the higher society of England? According to my own experience, and to all that I have seen and heard, and (have I lived there in the very highest and what is called the best) no way of life can be more corrupt. In Italy, however, it is, or rather seems, more systematized, but now, they themselves are ashamed of regular servitude. In England, the only homage which they pay to virtue is hypocrisy. I speak of courses, of the tone of high life,—the middle ranks may be very virtuous.

"I have not seen any copy (judging by what I have read) on the letter on Bowles; of course I should be delighted to send it to you. How is Mrs. H.? well again, I hope. Let me know when you set out. I regret that I cannot meet you in the Bathshea Alps this summer, as I once hoped and intended. With my best respects to madam, "I am ever, &.

"P. S. I enclose Mr. Bowles's letters; thank him in my name to his candor and kindness,—Also a letter for Hodgson, which pray forward. The Milan paper states that I brought forward the play!!! This is a pleasant surly. But don't let yourself be worried about it; and if (as is likely) the folly of Elliston checks the sale, I am ready to make any deduction, or the entire cancel of your agreement.

"You will of course not publish my defence of Gilchrist, as after Bowles's good humor upon the subject, it would be too savagely.

"Let me hear from you the particulars; for, as yet, I have only the simple fact.

"If you knew what I have had to go through here, on account of the fulness of the contents, Neapolitans, you would be amused: but it is now apparently over. They seemed disposed to throw the whole project and plans of these parts upon me chiefly."

LETTER CCCXCIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"May 14, 1821.

"If any part of the letter to Bowles has (unintentionally, as far as I remember the contents) vexed you, you are fully avenged; for I see an Italian paper, that, notwithstanding all my remonstrances through all my friends, (and yourself among the rest,) the managers persisted in attempting the tragedy, and that it has been 'unanimously hissed!!' This is the consolatory phrase of the Milan paper, (which detests me cordially, and abuses me, on all occasions, as a Liberal,) with the addition, that 'I brought the play out' of my own good-will.

"All this is vexatious enough, and seems a sort of dramatic Calvinism—predestined damnation, without a single hope that it will ever be a blessing, poor mortal could to prevent this inevitable catastrophe—partly by appeals of all kinds up to the Lord Chamberlain, and partly to the fellows themselves. But, as remonstrance was vain, complaint is useless; I do not understand it—for Murray's letter of the 24th, and all his preceding ones, gave me the strongest hopes that there would be no real presentation. As yet, I know nothing but the fact which I have come to be true, as the date is February the 30th. They must have been in a hell of a hurry for this damnation, since I did not even know that it was published; and, without its being first published, the hissions could not have got hold of it. Any one might have seen, at a glance, that it was utterly impracticable for the stage; and this little accident will by no means enhance its merit in the closet.

"Well, patience is a virtue, and, I suppose, practice will make it perfect. Since last year, (spring that is,) I have lost a lawsuit, of great importance, on Rochdale colleries—have occasioned a divorce—have had my poesy disparaged by Murray and the critics—they will not take my other friends to the place in an advantageous settlement (in Ireland) by the trustees —my life threatened last month—(they put about a paper here to excite an attempt at my assassination, on account of politics, and a notion which the priests disseminated that I was in a league against the Ger.
men)—and, finally, my mother-in-law recovered last fortnight, and I have only last week learned that she is well and, I hope, for ever cured. These are like the eight-and-twenty misfortunes of Harlequin.' But they must be borne. If I give in, it shall be after keeping up a spirit at least. I should not have cared so much about it, if our southern neighbors had not bungled us all out of freedom for these five hundred years to come.

"Did you know John Keats? They say that he was killed by a review of him in the Quarterly—if I remember, it is really done to know.+ I do not understand that of yielding sensitiveness. What I feel (as at this present) is an immense rage for right-and-forty hours, and then, as usual—unless this time it should last longer. I must get on horseback to quiet me.

"Francis I wrote, after the battle of Pavia, 'All is lost except our honor.' A hissed author may reverse it—'Nothing is lost except our honor.' But the horses are waiting, and the paper full. I wrote last week to you."

LETTER CCCXCV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

[Letter to John Murray, May 13, 1823.]

"By the papers of Thursday, and two letters of Mr. Kinnaid, I perceive that the Italian Gazette had lied most Italianishly, and that the drama had not been hissed, and that my friends had interfered to prevent the representation. So it seems they continue to act on the spirit of us all: for this we must trouble them at 'size.' Let it by all means be brought to a plea: I am determined to try the right, and will meet the expenses. The reason of the Lombard lies in this, that the Austrian—who keep an inquisition throughout Italy, and a list of names of all who think or speak of anything but in favor of their despotism—have for five years past abused me in every form in the Gazette of Milan, &c. I wrote to you a week ago on the subject.

"Now, I should be glad to know what compensation Mr. Elliston would make me, not only for dragging my writings on the stage in five days, but for losing the cause that I was kept for four days (from Sunday to Thursday morning, the only post dates in the belief that the tragedy had been acted and unamissed hissed; and this with the addition that 'I had brought upon the stage,' and consequence, the names of my friends attended to my request to the contrary. Suppose that I had burst a blood-vein, like John Keats, or blown my brains out in a fit of rage, neither of which would have been unlikely a few years ago. At present I am, luckily, calmer than I used to be, and yet I would not pass these four days over again for—I know not what.

"I wrote to you to keep up your spirits, for reproach is useless always, and irritating—but my feelings were very much hurt, to be dragged like a gladiator to the fate of a gladiator by that 'retia-rum,' Mr. Elliston. As to his defence and offers of compensation, what is all this to the purpose? It is like Louis the X1V. who insisted upon buying at any price Algenor Sydney's horse, and, on his refusal, on taking it by force, Sydney shot his horse. I could not shoot my tragedy, but I would have flung it into the fire rather than have had it represented.

"I have now written nearly three acts of another, intending to complete it in five, and am more anxious than ever to be preserved from such a breach of all literary courtesy and gentlemanly consideration.

"If we succeed, well; if not, previous to any future publication we will request a 'prière not to be acted, which I would even pay for, (as money is their object,) as I will not publish it, which, however, you will probably not much regret.

"The Chancellor has behaved nobly. You have also conducted yourself in the most satisfactory manner; and I have no fault to find with anybody but the stage-players, and their proprietors. I was always so civil to Elliston, personally, that he ought to have been the last to attempt to injure me.

"There is a most rattling thunder-storm peeling away at this present writing; so I write neither by day, nor by candle, nor torch light, but by lightning light; the flashes are as brilliant as the most gaseous glow of the gas-light company. My chimney board has just been thrown down by a gust of wind: I thought it was the 'Bold Thunder' and 'Brisk Lightning' in person.—Three of us would be too many. There it goes—flash again! but as I have done by and upon Mr. Elliston.

"Why do you not write? You should at least send me a line of particulars: I know nothing yet but by Galignani and the Honorable Douglas.

"Well, and how does our Pope controversy go on? and the pamphlet? It is impossible to write any news: the Austrian scoundrels rummage all letters.

"P. S. I could have sent you a good deal of gossip and some real information, were it not that all letters pass through the barbarians inspection, and I have no wish to inform them of anything but my utter abhorrence of them and theirs. They have only conquered by treachery, however.

LETTER CCCXCVI.

TO THE COUNTESS GUICCHIOLI.

"You will see here confirmation of what I told you the other day! I am sacrificed in every way, without knowing the why or the wherefore. The tragedy in question is not (nor ever was) written for, or adapted to, the stage; nevertheless, the plan is not romantic; it is rather regular than other wise: in point of unity of time, indeed, perfectly regular, and failing but slightly in unity of place. You well know whether it was ever my intention to have it acted, since I will not publish it at a period assuredly rather more tragic to me as a man than as an author; for you were in affliction and peril. In the mean time, I learn from your Gazette that a cabal and party has been formed, while I myself have never taken the slightest step in the business. It is said that the author read it aloud!!!—here, probably, at Ravenna?—and to whom? per hasps to Fletcher!!!—that illustrious literary character, &c., &c.

LETTER CCCXCVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Letter to Thomas Moore, May 26, 1823.]

"Since I wrote to you last week I have received English letters and papers, by which I perceive that what I took for an Italian truth is, after all, a French lie of the Bastille, with the false Habeas, the false papers, &c. I have also learned, from falsehoods in as many lines. In the first place, Lord B. did not bring forward his play, but opposed the same; and, secondly, it was not condemned, but is continued to be acted, in despite of publisher author, Lord Chancellor, and (for aught I know to the contrary) of audience, up to the first of May, at least—the latest date of my letters.
"You will oblige me, then, by causing Mr. Gazette of France to contradict himself, which, I suppose, he is used to. I never answer a foreign criticism; but this is a mere matter of fact, and not of opinions. I presume that you have English and French interest enough to do this for me—though, to be sure, as it is nothing and the truth which we wish to state, the insertion may be more difficult. I suppose written to you even lately at some length, I won't bore you further now, than by begging you to comply with my request; and I presume the 'esprit du corps,' (is it 'du' or 'de'? for this is more than I know) will sufficiently urge you, as one of 'ours,' to set this subject in its true light. Believe me always yours ever and most affectionately,

"BYRON"

LETTER CCCXCII.

TO MR. HOPFNER.

"Ravenne, May 25, 1821.

"I am very much pleased with what you say of Switzerland, and will ponder upon it. I would rather she married there than here for that matter. For fortune, I shall make it all that I can spare, (if I live and she is correct in her conduct,) and if I die before she is settled, I have left her by will five thousand pounds, which is a fair provision out of England for a natural child. I shall increase it all I can, if circumstances permit me; but, of course (like all other human things) this is very uncertain.

"You will oblige me very much by interfering to have the paper inserted, as these scoundrels appear to be organizing a system of abuse against me because I am in their 'list.' I care nothing for their criticism, but the matter of fact. I have written four acts of another tragedy, so you see they can't bully me.

"You know, I suppose, that they actually keep a list of all individuals in Italy who dislike them—it must be numerous. Their suspicious and actual alarms, about my conduct and presumed intentions in the late row, were truly ludicrous—though, not to bore you, I touched upon them lightly. They believed, and still believe here, or affect to believe it, that the whole plan and project of rising was settled by me, and the means furnished, &c. &c. All this was more somented by the barbarian agents, who are numerous here, (one of them was stabbed yesterday, by-the-way, but not dangerously;)—and although, when the Commandant was shot here before my door in December, I took him into my house, where he had every assistance till he died on Fletcher's bed; and although not one of them dared to receive him into their house but myself, they leaving him to perish in the night in the streets, they put up a paper about three months ago, denouncing me as the Chief of the Liberals, and stirring up persons to assassinate me. But this shall never silence nor bully my opinions. All this came from the German barbarians."

LETTER CCCXCIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenne, May 25, 1821.

"Mr. Moray,

"Since I wrote the enclosed a week ago, and for some weeks before, I have not had a line from you: now, a should be glad to know upon what principle of common or uncommon feeling, you leave me without any information but what I learn from gable gazettes in England, and abusive ones in Italian, (the Germans hating me, as a calculating,) while all this kick-up has been going on about the play? You shabby fellow!! Were it not for two letters from Douglas Kinnaid, I should have been as ignorant as you are negligent.

"So, I hear Bowles has been abusing Hobhouse; if that's the case, he has broken the truce, like Morillo's successor, and I will cut him out, as Cochrane did the Esmeralda.

"Since I wrote the enclosed packet I have completed (but not copied out) four acts of a new tragedy. When I have finished the fifth I will copy it out. It is on the subject of 'Sardanapalus,' the last king of the Assyrians. The words Queen and Paphilion occur, and as an allusion to His Britannic Majesty, as you may tremulously imagine. This you will one day see, (if I finish it,) as I have made Sardanapalus brave, (though valiantous as history represents him,) and also as amiable as my poor powers could render him—so that it could neither be truth nor satire on any living monarch. I have strictly preserved all the unities hitherto, and mean to continue them in the fifth, if possible; but not for the stage. Yours, in haste and hatred, you shabby corse! endent!"

LETTER CCCXCII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenne, May 26, 1821.

"Since my last of the 26th or 25th, I have dashed off my fifth act of the tragedy called 'Sardanapalus.' But now comes the copying over, which may prove heavy work—heavy to the writer as to the reader. I have written to you at least six times answering, which proves you to be a bookkeeper. I pray you to send me a copy of Mr. Wrangham's reformation of 'Langhorne's' Plutarch. I have the Greek, which is somewhat small of print, and the Italian, which is too heavy in style, and as false as a Neapolitan proclamation. I pray you also to send me a Life, published some years ago, of the Magician Apollonius of Tyana. It is in English, and I think edited or written by what Martin Marprelate calls 'a bawling priest.' I shall trouble you no farther with this sheet than with the postage.

"Yours, &c.,

"P. S. Since I wrote this, I determined to enclose it (as a half sheet) to Mr. Kinnaid, who will have the goodness to forward it. Besides, it saves sealing-wax."

LETTER D.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenne, May 31, 1821.

"Dear Moray,

"You say you have written often: I have only received you of the eleventh, which is very short. By this post, in five packets, I send you the tragedy of Sardanapalus, which is written in a rough hand: perhaps Mrs. Leigh can help you to decipher it. You will please to acknowledge it by return of post. You will remark that the unities are all strictly observed. The scene passes in the same hall always: the time, a summer's night, about nine hours, or less, though it begins before sunset and ends before sunrise. In the third act, when Sardanapalus calls for a mirror to look at himself in his armor, recollect to quote the Latin passage from Juvenal upon Otho, (a similar character, who did the same thing,—Gifford will help you with it.) The trait is perhaps too familiar, but it is historical, (to Otho, at least,) and natural is an adjective character."

"Yours, &c.,

"Ravenne,

"Mr. MURRAY,
LETTER I.

TO MR. HOPPNER.

[Byron, May 31, 1821.]

"I enclose you another letter, which will only confirm what I have said to you.

"About Allegro—I will take some decisive step in the course of the year; at present, she is so happy where she is, that perhaps she had better have her alphabet imparted in her convent.

"What you say of the Dante is the first I have heard of it—all seeming to be merged in the row about the tragedy. Continue it!—Alas! what could Dante, add other tragedy about Italy? You are glad you like it, however, but doubt that you will be singular in your opinion. My new tragedy is completed.

"The monsoni is right. I ought to have mentioned her humor and amiability, but I thought at her sixty, beauty would be most agreeable or least likely. However, it shall be rectified in a new edition; and if any of the parties have either looks or qualities which they wish to be noticed, let me have a minute of them. I have no private or personal dislike to Venice, rather the contrary, but I merely speak of what is the subject of all remarks and all writers upon her present state. Let me hear from you before you start. Believe me.

"Ever, &c.

"P. S. Did you receive two letters of Douglas Kinnaird's in an endorse from me? Remember me to Mengaldo, Soranzo, and all who care that I should remember them. The letter alluded to in the enclosed, 'to the Cardinal,' was in answer to some queries of the government, about a poor devil of a Neap litan, arrested in Sinagaglia on suspicion, who came to beg of me here; being without bread, I consequently got in his pockets some alms, I relieved and forwarded him to his country, and they arrested him at Pesaro on suspicion, and have since interrogated me (civilly and politely, however), about him. I sent them the poor man's petition, and such information as I had about him, which, I trust, will get him out again, that is to say, if they give him a fair hearing.

"I am content with the article. Pray did you receive the two copies of the English lines, which I enclosed to you, written at Paris?"

LETTER II.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Byron, June 4, 1821.]

"You have not written lately, as is the usual custom with literary gentlemen, to console their friends with their observations in cases of magnitude. I do not know whether I sent you any 'Elegy on the recovery of Lady Noel?'

"Behold the blessings of a lucky box—My play is done, and Lady Noel not.

"The papers (and perhaps your letters) will have put you in possession of Muster Elliston's dramatic behavior. It is to be presumed that the play was fitted for the stage by Mr. Dibdin, who is the tailor upon such occasions, and will have taken measure with his usual accuracy. I hear that it is still continued to be performed—a piece of obstinacy for which it is some consolation to think that the discountenanced histrion will be out of pocket.

"You will be surprised to hear that I have finished another tragedy in five acts, observing all the regularity. It is called 'Oriental; or the Moorish tragedy, and was sent by last post to England. It is not for the stage, any more than the other was intended for, and I shall take better care this time that they don't get hold on't.

"I have also sent, two months ago, a further letter on Bowles, &c.; but he seems to be so taken up with my 'respect' (as he calls it) towards him in the former case, that I am not sure that it will be published, being somewhat too full of "pastime and prodigality." I learn from some private letters of Bowles's, that you were 'the gentleman in astirisks.' Who would have dreamed it? you see what mischief that clergyman has done by printing notes without names. How the deuce was I to suppose that the first four astirisks meant 'Cumberland' and not 'Pope,' and that the blank signature meant Thomasina? and what comes of being familiar with parsons. His answers have not yet reached me, but I understand from Hobhouse that he (II.) is attacked in them. If that be the case, Bowles has broken the truce, (which he himself proclaimed, by-the-way,) and I must have at him again.

"Did you receive my letters with the two or three concluding sheets of Memoranda?

"There are no news here to interest much. A German spy (boasting himself such) was stabbed last week, but not mortally. The moment I heard that he went about bullying and boasting, it was easy for me, or any one else, to foretell what would occur to him, which I did, and it came to pass in two days after. He has got off, however, for a slight incision.

"A row the other night, about a lady of the place, between her various lovers, occasioned a midnight discharge of pistols, but nobody wounded. Great scandal, however—planted by her lover—to be thrashed by her husband; for inconstancy to her regular servant, who is coming home post about it, and she herself retired in confusion into the country, although it is the acme of the opera season. All the women furious against her (she herself having been censorious) for being found out. She is a pretty woman—a Countess * * * a fine old Visigoth name, or Ostrogth.

"The Greeks! what think you? They are my old acquaintances—but what to think I know not. Let us hope, housewrever. Yours,

"B."
"How do you call your new project? I have experimented with a new form, called 'Sardanapalus,' which I believe to be new and original, and it is entitled "The Tragedy of Sardanapalus." I have found that it is not too difficult, for it is written in blank verse, and the verse is in iambic tetrameters. I believe that it will appeal to the modern taste, and I think that it will be received with favor by the public."

"Bowie's answers have reached me; but I can't go on disputing for ever. No one can dispute with me, for I am the master of the situation."

"If you are in Paris, or a village, you will never resist the Anglo-invasion. You speak of the English in half a year, and when I am at home, I turn your horse's head the other way. You will see in the last note to the doge, that it was given me a good excuse for quite dropping the least connexion with travelers, a thing which you have not always done."

"I do not recollect the speech you spoke of, but suspect it is not the doge's, but one of Israel Berucchio to Calendario. I hope you think that Elliotson behaved shamefully; it is my only pity that and Bowles had not said the milennium falls contradict their Me, which they did with the grace of people used to it."

"Yours, &c., "B.""

LETTER DIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, July 5, 1821.

"How could you suppose that I ever would allow anything that could be said on your account to wrench with me? I do not regret that Bowles had not said that you were the writer of that note until afterward, when out he comes with it in a private letter to Murray, which Murray sends to me. D.—the controversy!"

"D.—the Twin, D.—the bell, And—where the soul who reigns is—Well! From all such pleasures I'll quickly be delivered.

I have had a friend of your Mr. Irving's—a very pretty lad—Mr. Coolidge, of Boston—only somebody too full of poetry and 'enthusiasm.' I was very civil to him during his few hours' stay, and talked with him much of Irving, whose writings are my delight. But I suspect that he did not take quite so much to me, from his having expected to meet a misanthropical gentleman, in wolf-skin breeches, and answering in fierce monosyllables, instead of a man of this world. I can never get people to understand that poetry is the expression of excited passion, and that there is no such thing as a life of passion any more than a continuous earthquake, or an eternal fever. Besides, who would wish to keep up the illusion which is their empire?"

"I have had a curious letter to-day from a girl in England, (I never saw her,) who says she is given over of a decline, but could not go out of the world without thanking me for the delight which my poetry for several years &c., &c. It is signed simply N. N. A., and has not a word of 'cant' or preachment in it upon any opinions. She merely says that she is dying, and that as I had contributed so highly to her existing pleasure, she thought that she might say so, begging me to turn her letter—which, by-the-way, I can not do, as I took upon such a letter, in such circumstances, as better than a diploma from Gottingen. I once had a letter from Dronthom, in Norway, (but not from a dying woman,) in verse, on the same score of gratulation. These are the things which make one at times believe one's self a poet. But if I must believe that, &c., &c., and such fellows, are poets also, it is better to be one of the corps."

"I am now in the fifth act of 'Foscari,' being the third tragedy in twelve months, besides proses; so you perceive that I am not at all idle. And are you, too, busy? I doubt that your life at Paris draws too much upon your time, which is a pity. Can't you divide your day, so as to combine both? I have had plenty of all sorts of worldly business on my hands last year,—and yet it is not so difficult to give a few hours to the Muus. This sentence is so like &c., &c., that—"

"Ever, &c.,"

"If we were together, I should publish both my plays (periodically) in our joint journal. It should be our plan to publish all our best things in that way.""

LETTER DV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, July 5, 1821.

"In agreement with a wish expressed by Mr. Hobhouse, it is my determination to omit the stanza upon the horse of Semiarmis in the fifth canto of Don Juan. I mention this, in case you are, or intend to be, the publisher of the remaining cantos."

"At the particular request of the C. S., I have promised not to continue Don Juan. You will therefore look upon these three cantos as the last of the poem. She had read the first two in the French translation, and never ceased beseeching me to write no more of it. The reason of this is not at first obvious to a superficial observer of your usual manners; but it arises from the wish of all women to exalt the sentiment of the passions, and to keep up the illusion which is their empire. Now Don Juan strips off this illusion, and laughs at that and most other things. I never knew a woman who did not protect Rousseau, nor one who did not dislike De Grammont, Gil Blas, and all the comedy of the passions, when brought out naturally. But 'kings' blood must keep word,' as Serjeant Bothwell says."

LETTER DVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"July 14, 1821.

"I trust that Sardanapalus will not be mistaken for a political play, which was so far from my intention, that I thought of nothing but Asiatic history. The Venetian play, too, is rigidly historical. My object has been to dramatize, like the Greek, (a modest phrase,) striking passages of history, as they did of history and mythology. You will find all this very unlike Shakespeare; and so much the better in one sense, for I look upon him to be the sorcer of models, though the most extraordinary of writers. It has been my object to be as simple and severe as Alfieri, and I have broken down the poetry nearly as far as was possible to common language. The hardship is, that in these times one can neither which is an error; it should be: Zaire, vous pleurez.'

Recollect this.

"I am so busy here about those poor proscribed exiles, who are scattered about, and with trying to get some of them recalled, that I have hardly time or patience to write a short preface, which will be proper for the two plays. However, I will make it out on receiving the next proofs.

"Yours ever, &c.

"P. S. Please to append the letter about the Helens: put as a note to your next opportunity of the verses on Leander, &c., &c., in Childe Harold. Don't forget it amid your multitudinous avocations, which I think of celebrating in a Dithyrambic Ode to Albermarle street.

"Are you aware that Shelley has written an Elegy on Keats, & accuses the Quarterly of killing him?

1. Who's kill'd Jos'ls Kears?
2. " asks the Quarterly.
3. So a rage and Tarpeian!
4. Two, one of my feasts!

"You know very well that I did not approve of Keats's poetry, or principles, or of his abuse of Pope; but, as he is dead, omit all that is said about him in MSS. of mine, or publication. His Hyperion is a fine monument, and will keep his name. I do not envy the man who wrote the article;—you Reviews people have no more right to kill than any other foot-pads. However, he who would die of an article in a Review would probably have died of something else equally trivial. The same thing nearly happened to Kirke White, who died afterward of a consumption.

LETTER DX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, August 2, 1821.

"I had certainly answered your last letter, though but briefly, to the part to which you refer, merely saying 'a damn the controversy,' and quoting some verses of George Colman's, 'not as allusive' to you, but to the disputants. Did you receive this letter? It imports me to know that our letters are not intercepted or mislaid.

"Your Berlin drama is an honor, unknown since the days of Elkanah Settle, whose 'Emperor of Morocco' was represented by the court ladies, which was, as Johnson says, 'the last blast of inflammation' to poor Dryden, who could not bear it, and fell foul of Settle without mercy or moderation, on account of that and a frontispiece, which he dared to put before his play.

"Was not your showing the Memoranda to * * somewhat pernicious? Is there not a factious allusion or two which might as well be reserved for posterity?

"I know Schlegel—well—that is so say, I have met him occasionally, at Copie. Is he not also touched lightly in the Memoranda? In a review of Childe Harold, canto fourth, three years ago, in Blackwood's Magazine, they quote some stanzas of an elegy of Stone on Rome, from which there is said that I might have taken some ideas. I give you my honor that I never saw it except in that criticism.

* See Letter ccxxv.

* This note was omitted.

* There had been, a short time before, performed at the Court of Berlin, a spectacle founded on the poem of Lalla Rookh, in which the present Emperor of Roumania, was one of the principal actors.
LETTER DXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Naples, August 10, 1821.

"Your conduct to Mr. Moore is certainly very handsome; and I would not say so if I could help it, for you are not at present by any means in my good graces.

"With regard to additions, &c., there is a journal which I kept in 1814, which you may ask him for; also a journal which you must get from Mrs. Leigh, of my journey in the Alps, which contains all the gernus of Manfred. I have also kept a small diary here, for a few months last winter, which I would send you, and any continuation. You would find easy access to all my papers and letters, and do not neglect this (in case of accidents), on account of the mass of confusion in which they are; for out of that chaos of papers you will find some curious ones of mine and others, if not lost or destroyed. If circumstances, however, (which is almost impossible,) made me ever consent to a publication in my lifetime, you would, I suppose, make Moore some advance, in proportion to the likelihood or non-lielihood of success. You are both sure to survive me, however.

"You must also have from Mr. Moore the correspondence between me and Lady Byron, to whom I offered the sight of all which regards herself in these papers. This is important. He has her letter, and a copy of my answer. I would rather Moore edited me than another.

"I sent you Valpy's letter to decide for yourself, and Stockdale's to amuse you. I am always loyal with you, as I was in Galignani's affair, and you won me—now and then.

"I return you Moore's letter, which is very creditable to him, and you, and me. "Yours, ever."

LETTER DXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Naples, August 16, 1821.

"I regret that Holmes can't or won't come: it is rather shabby, as I was always very civil and punctual with him. But he is but one * * * more. One meets with none elsewhere among the English.

"I wait the proofs of the MSS. with proper impatience.

"So you have published, or mean to publish, the new Juans? Aren't you afraid of the Constitutional Assassination of Bridge street? When first I saw the name of Murray I thought it had been yours; but was solaced by seeing that your synonyme is an attorney and that you are not one of that atrocious crew.

"I am in a great discomfort about the probable war, and with my trustees not getting me out of the funds. If the funds break, it is my intention to go upon the highway. All the other English professions are at present so unglemelianeby by the conduct of those who follow them, that open robbing is the only fair resource left to a man of any principles; it is even honest, in comparison, by being undisguised.

"I wrote to you by last post, to say that you had done the handsome thing by Moore and the Memo- randa. You are very good as times go, and would probably be still better but for the march of events. (Napoleon called it,) which won't permit my body to be better than they should be.

"Love to Gifford. Believe me, &c.

"P. S. I restore Smith's letter, whom thank for his good opinion. Is the bust by Thorwaldsen ar- rived?"

NOTE.

"For Oxford and for Wellesbrenge
You gave much more than me you gave
Which is not fairly to behave,
My Murray.

"Because if a Bux dog, 'tis said,
Be worth a bon fairly spoil,
A Sted lord must be worth two dead,
My Murray.

"And if, as the opinion goes,
You wish a letter note them prove Correct, I should have more than these,
My Murray.

"But now this sheet is nearly crum'd.
So, if you will, I shan't be shan't hid,
And, if you won't, you may be don't,
My Murray.

"These matters must be arranged with Mr. Douglas Kinnaird. He is my trustee, and a man of honor. To him you can state all your mercantile reasons, which you might not like to state to me personally, such as, 'heavy season,—' flat public—' don't go off—' lordship writes too much—' won't take advice—' declining popularity—' deduction for the trade—' make very little—' generally lose by him—' pirated edition—' foreign edition—' severe criticisms,' &c., with other hints and hows for an oration, which I leave Douglas, who is an orator, to answer.

"You can also state them more freely to a third person, as between you and me they could only produce some smart postscripts, which would not adorn our mutual archives.

"I am sorry for the Queen, and that's more than you are."
LETTER DXIV

TO MR. MOORE.

"Ravenna, August 24, 1821.

"Yours of the 5th only yesterday, while I had letters of the 8th from London. Doth the post dabble into our letters? Whatever agreement you make with Murray, if satisfactory to you, must be so to me. There need be no scruple, because, though I used sometimes to buffet to myself, loving a quibble as well as the barbarian himself (Shakspeare, to wit) — that, like a Spartan, I would sell my life as dearly as possible — it never was my intention to turn it to personal, pecuniary account, but for the event of survivorship. I anticipated that period, because we happened to meet, and I urged you to make what was possible now by it, for reasons which are obvious. It has been no possible plication to me, and therefore does not require the acknowledgments you mention. So, for God's sake, don't consider it like.

"By-the-way, when you write to Lady Morgan, will you thank her for her handsome speeches in her book about my books? I do not know her address. Her work is fearless and excellent on the subject of Italy — pray tell her so — and I know the country. I wish she had fallen in with me, I could have told her a thing or two that would have confirmed her positions.

"I am glad that you are satisfied with Murray, who seems to value dead lords more than live ones. I have just sent him the following answer to a proposition of his:

"For Oxford and for Waldegrave, &c.

The argument of the above is, that he wanted to stint me of my sizings, as Lear says—that is to say, to deprive me of an extravagant price for an extravagant poem, as is becoming. Pray take his guineas by all means—I taught him that. He made me a filthy offer of pounds once, but I told him that, like physicians, poets must be dealt with in guineas, as being the only advantage poets could have in the association with them, as votaries of Apollo. I write to you in a hurry and bustle, which I will expend in my next.

"Yours, ever, &c.

"P. S. You mention something, of an attorney on his way to me on legal business. I have had no warning of such an apparition. What can the fellow want? I have some lawsuits and business, but have not heard of any thing to put me to the expense of a travelling lawyer. They do enough, in that way at home.

"Ah, poor Queen! but perhaps it is for the best, if Herodotus's anecdote is to be believed.

"Remember me to any friendly Angles of our mutual acquaintance. What are you doing? Here I have had my hands full of tyrants and their victims. There never was such oppression, even in Ireland, scarcely!"

LETTER DXV

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Ravenna, August 31, 1821.

"I have received the Juans, which are printed so carelessly, especially the fifth canto, as to be disgraceful to me, and not creditable to you. It really must be gone over again with the manuscript; the errors are so gross; -- words added — changed — so as to make cacophon and nonsense. You have been careless of this poem because some of your squad don't approve of it; but I tell you that it will be long before you see any thing half so good as poetry or writing. Upon what principle have you omitted the note on Bacon and Voltaire? as one of the conclusions? — because it ended, I suppose, with —

"And do not link two vicious souls for life
Into that moral cemetary, man and wife.

"Now, I must say, once for all, that I will not permit any human being to take such liberties with my writings because I am absent. I desire the omission to be replaced (except the stanza on Semiramis), particularly the stanza upon the Turkish marriages; and I request that the whole be carefully gone over with the MS.

"I never saw such stuff as is printed; — Gulleyays instead of Gulbeys, &c. Are you aware that Gulbeys is a real name and the other nonsense I copied the canto out carefully, so that there is no excuse, as the printer read, or at least prints, the MS. of the plays without error.

"If you have no feeling for your own reputation, pray have some little for mine. I have read over the poem carefully, and I tell you, it is poetry. Your little envious knot of parson-poets may say what they please: time will show that I am not in this instance mistaken.

"Desire my friend Hobhouse to correct the press, especially of the last canto, from the manuscript as it is. It is enough to drive one out of one's reason to see the infernal torture of words from the original. For instance, the line—

"And pair their rhymes as Venus yokes her doves—" is printed—

"And praise their rhymes, &c.

Also 'precious' for 'precocious,' and this stanza 133,

"And this strong extreme effect to tire no longer.

Now do turn to the manuscript, and see if I ever wrote such a line; it is not verse.

"No wonder the poem should fail, (which, how ever, it won't, you will see,) with such things allowed to creep about it. Replace what is omitted, and correct what is so shamefully misprinted, and let the poem have fair play; and I fear nothing.

"I see in the last two numbers of the Quarterly a strong itching to assail me, (see the review of 'The Etionian;') let it, and see if they shan't have enough of it. I do not allude to Gifford, who has always been my friend, and whom I do not consider as responsible for the articles written by others.

"You will publish the plays when ready. I am in such a humor about this printing of Don Juan so inaccurately that I must close this.

"Yours.

"P. S. I presume that you have not lost the stanza to which I allude? It was sent afterward: look over my letters and find it."

PHILOSOPHICAL ADVICE AND OBSERVATIONS.}

TO MR. W. M.

By Mr. Mawman, (a paymaster in the corps, in which you and I are privates,) I yesterday expedited to your address, under cover of an autograph letter, containing the substance of this—In short, it won't do— even for the posthumous public—but extracts from it may. It is a brief and faithful chronicle of a month or so—parts of it not very discreet, but sufficiently sincere. Mr. Mawman saith that he will, in private, discourse with me, and deliver it to you in your Elginian fields.

If you have got the new Juans, recollect that there are some very gross printer's blunders, particularly in the first entry,—such as 'praise' for 'pair,' 'precarious' for 'precocious,' 'Adriatic' for 'Asiatic,' 'case' for 'chase'—besides gifts of additional words and syllables, which make but a cacophonous rhythm. Put the pen through the said, as I would mine through Murray's ears if I were along side of him. As it is, I have sent him a rattling letter, as abusive as possible. Though he is publisher to the 'Board of Longitude,' he is in no danger of discovering it.

I am packing for Pisa— but direct your letters here, till further notice.

Yours ever,

One of the 'paper books' mentioned in this letter: as intrusted to Mr. Mawman for me, contained a portion, to the amount of nearly a hundred pages, of a prose story, relating the adventures of a young Andalusian nobleman, which had been begun by him at Venice, in 1817, of which the following is an extract.

TO MR. M.

By Saturday's post, I sent you a fierce and farbund letter upon the subject of the printer's blunders in Don Juan. I must solicit your attention to the topic, though my wrath hath subsided into mildness. I cannot but feel that it is a great pity that their books and packages even to the very chairs and tables, for I am going to Pisa in a few weeks, and have sent and am sending off my chattle. It regretted me that, my books and everything being packed, I could not send you a few things I meant for you; but they were all sealed and baggaged, so as to have made it a month's work to get at them again. I gave him an envelope, with the Italian scrap in it, alluded to in my Glichrist defence. Hohkhouse will make it out for you, and it will make you laugh, and him too, the spelling particularly. The 'Merrican,' of whom they call me the 'Cabo,' (or chief, meaning 'Americans,' which is the name given in Roman to a part of the Carbonari; that is to say, to the popular part, the troops of the Carbonari. They are originally a society of hunters in the forest, who took the name of Americans, but at present comprise some thousands, &c.; but I shan't let you further into the secret, which may be participated with the post masters. Why they thought me their chief, I know not; their chiefs are like the Legion, being many. However, it is a past of more honor than profit, for, now that they are per secded, it is fit that I should aid them; and so I have done, as far as my means would permit. They will rise again in the eyes of the government and plundering: they actually seem to know nothing, for they have arrested and banished many of their own party, and let others escape who are not their friends.

What think'st thou of Greece?

Address to me here as usual, till your hear father from me.

By Mawman I have sent a Journal to Moore; but it won't do for the public,—at least great deal of it won't:—parts may.

I read over the Juans, which are excellent.

Your squad are quite wrong; and so you will find

An anonymous letter which he had received, threatening him with starvation.
by-and-by. I regret that I do not go on with it, for I had all the plan for several cantos, and different countries and characters. You say nothing of the notes I enclosed to you, which will explain why I agreed to discontinue it, (at Madame Guiccioli's request;) but you are so grand, and sublime, and occupied, that one would think, instead of publishing for 'the Board of Longitude,' that you were trying to discover it.

"Let me hear that Gifford is better. He can't be spared either by you or me."

LETTER DXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

[Ravenna, Sept. 12, 1821.]

"By Tuesday's post, I forwarded, in three packets, the drama of Cain in three acts, of which I requested the acknowledgment when arrived. To the last speech of Eve, in the last act, (i.e. where she curses Cain,) add these three lines to the concluding ones—

May the gressa wither from thy foot the woods
Deep then the earth on which he laid the dust
A grave I the sun his light I and Heaven her God!"

"There's as pretty a piece of imprecation for you, when joined to the lines already sent, as you may wish to meet with in the course of your business. But don't forget the addition of the above three lines, which are clinchers to Eve's speech.

Let me know what Gifford and his friends, (if the play arrives in safety;) for I have a good opinion of the piece, as poetry; it is in my gay metaphysical style, and in the Manfred line.

"You must at least commend my faculty and versatility, when you consider what I have done within the last fifteen months, with my head, too, full of other and of mundane matters. But no doubt you will avoid saying any good of it, for fear I should raise the price upon you: that's right: stick to business. Let me know what your other ragamuffins are writing, for I suppose you don't like starting too many of your vagabonds at once. You may give them the start for anything I can.

"If you don't publish my Pulei—the very best thing I ever wrote—with the Italian to it? I wish I was alongside of you; nothing is ever done in a man's absence; everybody runs counter, because they can. If ever I do return to England, (which I shan't, though,) I will write a poem to which 'English Bards,' &c., shall be new milk, in comparison. Your present literary world of mountebanks stand in need of such an Avatar. But I am not yet quite bilious enough: a season or two more, and a provocation or two, will wind me up to the point, and then have at the whole set!

"I have no patience with the sort of trash you send me out of books; except Scott's novels, and three or four other things, I never saw such work, or works. Campbell is lecturing—Moura Ming—Southey; wadding—Wordsworth drizzling—Coleridge muddling—\[saddling—Bowles quibbling, squabbling, and muddling. * * * will do, if he don't cant too much, nor imitate Southey; the fellow has poesy in him; but he is envious and unhappi,

As the whole ensues. Still he is among the best; Tennyson of Barry Cornwall I did better and by, I dare say, if he don't get spoiled by green tea, and the praises of Pantonville and Paradise-row. The pity of these men is, that they never lived in a world of mead and wine; and innumerable men for the knowledge of the busy or the still world. If admitted into high life for a season, it is merely as spectators—they form no part of the mechanism thereof. Now, Moore and I, the one by circumstances, and the other by birth, happened to be free of the corporation, and to have entered into its pulses and passions, quarram partes jamina. Both of us have learned by this much which nothing else could have taught us.

"Yours.

"P. S. I saw one of your brethren, another of the allied sovereigns of Grub street, the other day, Mawman the Great, by whom I sent due homage to your Imperial P. P. To-morrow will you bring a letter from you, but you are the most ungrateful and ungracious of correspondents. But there is some excuse for you, with your perpetual retinue of politicians, paras, scribblers, and loungers. Some day I will give you a poetical catalogue of them."

LETTER DXX.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Ravenna, Sept. 17, 1821.]

"The enclosed lines, as you will directly perceive, are written by the Rev. W. L. Bowl. Of course it is for him to deny them if they are not.

Believe me yours ever and most affectionately,

"P. S. Can you forgive this? It is only a reply to your lines against my Italians. Of course I will stand by my lines against all men; but it is heart breaking to see such things in a people as the reception of that redeemed * * * * * in an oppressed country. Your apotheosis is now reduced to a level with his welcome, and their gratitude to Grattan is cancelled by their atrocious adulation of this, &c., &c., &c."

LETTER DXXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Ravenna, Sept. 19, 1821.]

"I am in all the sweat, dust, and blasphemy of a universal packing of all my things, furniture, &c., for Pisa, which I go for the winter. The cause has been the exile of all my fellow Carbonies, and, among them, of the whole family of Madame G. who, you know, was divorced from her husband last week, of P. P. clerk of this parish, and who is obliged to join her father and relatives now in exile there, to avoid being shut up in a monastery, because the Pope's decree of separation required her to reside in casa paterorum, or else, for decorum's sake, in a convent. As I could not say, with Hamlet, 'Get thee to a nunnery,' I am preparing to follow them.

"It is awful work, this love, and prevents all a man's projects of good or glory. I wanted to go to Greece lately (as everything seems up here) with her brother, who is a very fine, brave fellow, (I have seen him put to the proof,) and wild about liberty. But the tears of a woman who has left a husband for a man, and the weakness of one's own heart, are paramount to these projects, and I can hardly indulge them.

"We were divided in choice between Switzerland and Turkey, and I give my vote for Pisa, as near the Mediterranean, which I love for the sake of the shores which it washes and for my young recollections of 1809. Switzerland is a cursed, selfish, swinish country of brutes, placed in the most romantic region of the world. I never could bear the

* The Irish Answer. Poem, p. 372. Is this the copy, the folk song verse (taken from a letter of Cowper, in the side Left of that true Irishman by his song") prefaced as a motto to the poem?—And Ireland, I, like a hired soldier, knuckled to receive the pail's rider. —Letter of Cowper Life, vol. ii., p. 536. At the end of the verses are these words ("Signed W. L. Bowl. " * * M. A., and written with a view to a Reprint".)—Adda. inhabitants, and still less their English visitors; for which reason, after writing for some information short houses, being thus brought my hearing. Was a collection of English all over the cantons of Geneva, &c., I immediately gave up the thought, and persuaded the Gambards to do the same.

"By last post I sent you the 'Irish Avatar,'- what think you? The last line—a name never spoke but with curses or jeers—must run either a name only uttered with curses or jeers, or 'a wrench never named but with curses or jeers.'
Because as house, 'spoke' is not grammar except in the House of Commons; and I doubt whether we can say 'a name spoken,' for mentioned. I have some doubts, too, about, 'reply,' and for murder reply with a shout and a smile.' Should it not be, and for murder repay him with shouts and a smile,' or 'reward him with shouts and a smile.'

"So, pray put your poetical pen through the MS.
and take the least bad of the emendations. Also,
if there be no farther breaking of Priscian's head, will you apply a plaster? I wrote in the greatest hurry and fury, and sent it to you the day after; so, doubtless, there will be some awful constructions, and rants, and repetitions ofithamus.

"With respect to what Anna Seward calls 'the liberty of transcript,'—when complaining of Miss Matilda Muggleton, the accomplished daughter of a choral vicar of Worcester Cathedral, who had abused the liberty of transcript, for inserting in the Malvern Mercury, Miss Seward's 'Elegy on the South Pole,' as her own production, with her own signature, two years after having taken a copy, by permission of the authors with regard, I say, to the 'liberty of transcript,' I by no means oppose an occasional copy to the benevolent few, provided it does not degenerate into such licentiousness of verb and noun as may tend to 'disparage my parts of speech' by the carelessness of the transcribers.

"I do not think that there is much danger of the King's Press being abused' upon the occasion, if the publishers of journals have any regard for their remaining liberty of person. It is as pretty a piece of invective as ever put publisher in the way to 'Botany.' Therefore, if they meddle with it, it is at their peril. As for myself, I will answer any gentleman—though I by no means recognize a right of search into an unpublished production, and unvoiced poem. The same applies to things published sans consent. I hope you like, at least, the concluding lines of the poem?

"What is doing, and where are you? in England? Naif Murray—will him to his own counter, till he shouls out the thirtrees. Since I wrote to you, I have sent him another tragedy,—'Cain' by name—making three in MS. now in his hands, or in the printer's. It is in the Manfred, metaphysical style, and full of some Titanic declamation; Lucifer being one of the dram. pers. who takes Cain a voyage among the stars, and, afterwards, to 'Hades,' where he shows the phantoms of a former world, and its inhabitants. I have gone upon the notion of Cuvier, that the world has been destroyed three times or four times, and was inhabited by mammals, men, behemoths, and what not; but not by man till this 'Rosalie' period, as, indeed, is proved by the strata of bones found—those of all unknown animals, and known, being dug out, but none of mankind. I have, therefore, supposed Cain to be shortly. Yet I think, therefore, Cain being endowed with a higher intelligence than man, but totally unlike him in form, and with much greater strength of mind and person. You may suppose the small talkable, between Cain and Lucifer upon these matters is not quite canonical.

"The consequence is, that Cain comes back and kills Abel in a fit of dissatisfaction, partly with the politics of Paradise, which had driven them all out of it, and partly a cause (as is written in Genesis) for Abel's sacrifice was the more acceptable to the Deity. I trust that the Rhapsody has arrived—it is in three acts, and entitled 'A Mystery,' according to the former Christian custom, and in honor of what it probably will remain to the reader.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DXXII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"September 30, 1821,

"After the stanza on Grattan, concluding with 'His soul o'er the freedom implored and denied, will it please you to cause the printer to insert the following 'Addenda,' which I dreamed of during to-day's siesta:

'Ever glorious Grattan! &c., &c., &c.

I will tell you what to do. Get me twenty copies of the whole carefully and privately printed off, as your lines wore on the Naples affair. Send me six, and distribute the rest according to your own pleasure.

"I am in a fine vein, so full of pastime and prod-igality!—So, here's to your health in a glass of grog. Pray write, that I may know by return of post—address me at Pisa. The gods give you joy!

"Where are you? in Paris? Let us hear. You will take care that there be no printer's name, nor author's, as in the Naples stanza, at least for the present."

LETTER DXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Rivenna, Sept. 30, 1821.

"You need not send 'the Blues,' which is a mere buffoonery, never meant for publication.

"The papers to which I allude, in case of survi-worship, are collections of letters, &c., since I was sixteen years old, contained in the trunks in the -care of Mr. Hobhouse. This collection is at least doubled by those I have now here, all received since my last ostracism. To these I should wish the editor to have access, not for the purpose of abusing confidences, nor of hurting the feelings of correspondents living, nor the memories of the dead;
but there are things which would do neither, that I have left unnoticed or unexplained, and which (like all such things) time only can permit to be noticed or explained, though some are to my credit. The task will of course require delicacy; but that will not being wanted, if Moore and Hobhouse survive me, and, I may add, yourself; and that you may all done so is, I assure you, my very sincere wish.
I am not sure that long life is desirable for one o my temper and constitutional depressions of spirits, which of course I suppose in society; but which breaks out when alone, and in my writings, in some of myself. It has been deepened, perhaps, by some long-past events. (I do not allude to my marriage, &c.—on the contrary, that raised them by the persecution giving a fillip to my spirits;) but I call it constitutional, as I have reason to think it. You know, or you do not know, that my maternal grandfather, (a very clever man, and smiable, I am told), was strongly suspected of suicide, (he was found drowned in the Avon at Bath,) and that another ever near related, also a suicide, which took poison and was merely saved by antidotes. For the first of these events there was no apparent cause, as he was rich, respected, and of considerable intellectual resources, hardly forty years of age, and not at all addicted to any unwholesome vice. It was, however out a strict asspicion, owing to the manner of his death and his melancholy temper. The second had a cause, but it does not become me to touch it:

LETTERS.

it happened when I was far too young to be aware of it, and I never heard of it till after the death of my maternal grandfather. Nor do I ever think, then, that I may call this defection constitutional. I had always been told that I resembled more my maternal grandfather than any of my father’s family—that is, in the gloomier part of his temper, for he was what you call a good-natured man, and I am not.

"The journal here sent to Moore the other day;
but as it is a more idle, only parts of it would ever be for publication. The other journal of the tour in 1810, I should think Augusts might let you have a copy of.

"I am much mortified that Gifford don’t take to my new dramas. To be sure, they are as opposite to the English drama as one thing can be to another; but I have a notion that, if understood, they will in time find favor (though not on the stage) with the reader. The simplicity of plot is intentional, and the avoidance of rant also, as also the compression of the speeches in the more severe situations. What I seek to show in ‘the Foscaris’ is the suppressed passions, rather than the rant of the present day. For that matter—

‘Nay, if thou’st much,
I’ll rate as well as thou’st would not be difficult, as I think I have shown in my younger productions,—not dramatic ones, to be sure. But, as I said before, I am mortified that Gifford don’t like them; but I see no remedy, our notions on that subject being so different. How is he?—well, I have heard. So I regret his demur the more that he has been always my grand patron, and I know no praise which would compensate me in my own mind for his censure. I do not mind Reviews, as I can work them at their own weapons.

‘Yours, &c.’

‘Address me to Pisso, whither I am going.
The reason is, that all my Italian friends here have been exiled, and are met there for the present, and I go to join them, as agreed upon, for the winter.’

LETTER DXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

‘Ravenna, Sept. 26, 1831.

‘I have been thinking over our late correspondence, and wish to propose to you the following articles for our future:

‘1stly. That you shall write to me of yourself, of the health, wealth, and welfare of all friends; but of me (ground me) little or nothing.

‘2dly. That you shall send me soda-powders, tooth-powder, tooth-brushes, or any such anti-dentulatic or chemical articles, as heretofore, ‘ad Shirurn,’ upon being reimbursed for the same.

‘3dly. That you shall not send me any modern, or (as they are called) new publications, in English whatever, save and excepting any writing, prose or verse, of (or reasonably presumed to be of) Walter Scott, Wordsworth, Tennyson, or such like authors, Joanna Baillie, Irving, (the American,) Hogg, Wilson, (the Isle of Palms man,) or any especial single work of fancy which is thought to be of considera-table merit; Fugues and Travels, provided that they are neither in Greece, Spain, Asia Minor, Albania, or Italy, will be welcome. Having travelled the countries mentioned, I know that what is said of them can convey nothing farther which I desire to know about them. —No other English works whatsoever.

‘4thly. That you send me no periodical works.

‘whatever—no Edinburgh, Quarterly, Monthly, or any review, magazine, or newspaper, English or foreign, of any description.

‘5thly. That you send me no opinions whatsoever, either good, bad, or indifferent, of yourself, or my friends, or of any concerning my soil, or work, or works, of mine, past, present, or to come.

‘6thly. That all negotiations in matters of business between you and me pass through the medium of the Hon. James Kinmail, my friend and trust-too, or Mr. Hobhouse, as ‘Alloa.’

‘Also, that mount to myself during my absence—or presence.

‘Some of these propositions may at first seem strange, but they are founded. The quantity of trash I have received and been forced to shun never amused nor instructed. Reviews and magazines are at the best but ephemeral and superficial reading;—who thinks of the grand article of last year in any given Review? In the next place, if they regard myself, they tend to increase egotism.
If favorable, I do not deny that the praise elates, and if unfavorable, that the abuse irritates.
The latter may conduct me to inflict a species of satire, which would do me good, and do good. My father friends: they may smile now, and so may you; but if I took you all in hand, it would not be difficult to cut you up like gourds. I did as much by as powerful people at nineteen years old, and I know little as yet, in my thirtieth, which should prevent me from making all your ribs gridiron for your hearts, if such were my propensity: but it is not;
therefore let me hear none of your provocations.
If any thing occurs so very gross as to require my notice, I shall hear of it from my legal friends. For the rest, I merely request to be left in ignorance.

‘The same applies to opinions, good, bad, or indifferent, of persons in conversation or correspondence. They may interrupt the current of my mind. I am sensitive enough, but not till I am troubled; and here I am beyond the touch of the short arms of literary England, except the few feelers of the polyops that crawl over the channels in the way of extract.

‘All these precautions in England would be use less; the libellor or the flatterer would there reach me in spite of all; but in Italy we know little of literary England, and think less, and they never reach us through some garbled and brief extract in some miserable gazette. For two years (excepting two or three articles cut out and sent to you by the post), I have read a newspaper, which was forced upon me by some accident, and know, upon the whole, as little of England as you do of Italy, and God knows that is little enough, with all your travels, &c. The English travellers know Italy as you know Guernsey: how much is that?

‘If any thing occurs so violently gross or personal as requires notice, Mr. Douglas Kinmail will let me know; but of praise, I desire to hear nothing.

‘You will say, ‘to what tends all this?’ I will answer that:—to keep my mind free and unbiased by all paltry and personal irritabilities of praise or censure—to let my genius take its natural direction, while my feelings are like the dead, who do nothing and care nothing of all or aught that is said or done in their regard.

‘If you can observe these conditions, you will spare yourself and others some pain; let me not be forced to work upon you to cease: for if I do, it will not be for a little. If you cannot observe these conditions, shall cease to be correspondents,—but not friends, for I shall always be yours and ever truly,

‘Yours,

‘1 D xo.

‘P. S. I have taken these resolutions, not from any irritation against you or yours, but simply upon reflection that all reading, either praise or censure, of myself has done me harm. When I was in Switzerland and Greece, I was out of the way of hearing of others: thus I have never been out of the way of it too; but latterly, partly through my fault, and partly through your kindness, in wishing to send me the newest and most periodical publications, I have had a crowd of Reviews, &c., thrust upon me, which have bored me with their jargon, of one kind or another, and taken off my attention from greater objects. You have also sent me a parcel of trash or poetry, for no reason that I can conceive, unless to provoke me to write a new 'English Bard.' Now this I wish to avoid: for if ever I do, it will be a strong production; and I desire peace as long as the fools will keep their nonsense out of my way."

LETTER DXXV.

To Mr. Moore.

September 27, 1821.

"It was not Murray's fault. I did not send the MS. to him, but I sent it now, and it may not restored;—or, at any rate, you may keep the original, and give any copies you please. I send it, as written, and as I read it to you—I have no other copy.

"By last week's two posts, in two packets, I sent to your address, at Paris, a long poem upon the late Irishism of your countrymen in their reception of the Roman Pray, have you received it? It is in the high Romantic fashion, and full of original fancy. As you could not well take up the matter with Paddy, (being of the same nest,) I have:—but I hope still that I have done justice to his great men and his good heart. As for you, you will find it laid on with a trawl. I delight in your fact historical—is it a fact?

"P. S. You have not answered me about Schlegel—why not? Address me to Pinta, whither I am going, to join the exile—a pretty numerous body, at present. Let me hear how you are, and what you mean to do. Is there no chance of your recrossing the Alps? If the G. Rax marries again, let him not want an Epithalamium—suppose a joint concern of you and me, like Sternhold and Hopkins!"

LETTER DXXVI.

To Mr. Murray.

September 29, 1821.

"I add another cover to request you to ask Moore to obtain (if possible) my letters to the late Lady Melbourne from Lady Cowper. They are very numerous, and ought to have been restored long ago, as I was ready to give back Lady Melbourne's in exchange. These latter are in Mr. Holhouse's copy by my other papers, and shall be run together restored. I did not choose before to apply to Lady Cowper, as her mother's death naturally kept me from inquiring upon her feelings at the time of its occurrence. Some years have now elapsed, and it is essential that I should have my own epistles. 'They are essential as confirming that part of the 'Memoranda' which refers to the two periods (1812 and 1814) when my marriage with her was in contemplation.' I suppose, but I am not sure. My real views and feelings were upon that subject.

"You need not be alarmed, the 17th year of \(\text{17}^{1/2}\) will hardly elapse without some reality among us:

* The lines "Oh Wiltshire, you, a rose, so red, so fair," etc., were, probably, written by Byron in the last days of his life, and had been intended for a poem that never appeared; and the same may be said of the lines on "the true, the poet, the world." Moore.

† For a poem of ""Lady Byron,"" see Dec. 8, 1821, ante, where Moore first refers to Lady Byron, in these terms: "I hope you will make your friend Moore the subject of a poem, which I promise shall be published in his lifetime, the sum now paid for 'the poet, the world' world, being probably upon a reasonable calculation of services, amount unequally to less than $500." Moore.

[The two enclosures, mentioned in the foregoing note, were one letter intended to be sent to Lady Byron, relative to his money invested in the funds, of which the following are extracts.]
LETTERS.

Maynooth, March. 5th, 1821.

"I have received your message, through my sister's letter, about English security, &c., &c. It is considerate, (and true, even,) that such is to be found—but not that I shall find it. Mr. * * *, for his own views and purposes, will thwart all such attempts till he has accomplished his own, viz., to make me lend my fortune to some client of his choosing."

"At this distance—after this absence, and with my utter ignorance of affairs and business—with my temper and impatience, I have neither the means nor the mind to resist. * * * * * Thinking of the funds as I do, and wishing to secure a reversion to my sister and children, I should naturally select Pisa."

"What I told you is come to pass—the Napoleonic war is declared. Your funds will fall, and I shall be in consequence ruined. That's nothing—but my blood-relations will be so. You and your child are provided for. Live and prosper—I wish so much to both. Live and prosper—you have the means. I think but of my real kin and kindred, who may be the victims of this accursed bubble."

"You neither know nor dream of the consequences of this war. It is a war of men with monarchs, and will spread like a spark on the dry, rank grass of the vegetable desert. What it is with you and your English, you do not know, nor do I wish you to know, for it is in the air, and around, and within us."

"Judge of my detention of England and of all that it inherits, when I avoid returning to your country at a time when such a pecuniary interest, but it may be, even my personal security require it. I can say no more, for all letters are opened. A short time will decide upon what is to be done here, and then you will learn it without being more troubled with me or my correspondence. Whatever happens an individual is little, so that the cause is forwarded."

"I have no more to say to you on the score of affairs or any other subject." [The second enclosure in the note consisted of some verses, written by him, December 19th, 1829, on seeing the following paragraph in a newspaper.]

"Amy Byron is this year the lady patroness at the annual Charity Ball, given at the Town Hall at Hinckley, Leicestershire, and Sir G. Crewe, Bart, the principal steward." These verses are full of strong and indignant feeling,—and stanza co. cluding point with the words "Charity Ball," and the thought that predominates through the whole may be extracted from a few of the opening lines. [Moore.]"

"What matter the pangs of a husband and father, If his sorrows in exile be great or be small, So the Friendship's glories around her she gather, And the Saint-pourtrays her 'Charity Ball.'"

"What matter—ah heaven, which though faintly was feeling, Be letras to excuses which gone could appeal— That at Slieve equal suffer is only false dealing, As the Saint keeps her charity back for the Ball!' &c., &c."

LETTER DXXVIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"September—no—October 1, 1821."

"I have written to you lately, both in prose and verse, at great length, to Paris, and London. I presume that Mrs. Moore, or whoever is your Paris deputy, will forward my packets to you in London."

"I am setting off for Pisa, if a slight incipient intermittent fever do not prevent me. I fear it is too strong to give Murray much chance of realizing his thirty times again. I hardly should regret it, I think, provided you raised your price upon him—as what Lady Holderness (my sister's grandmother, a Dutch woman) used to call Augusta, her "Residue Legato"—so as to provide for us all; my bones with a splendid and larmoyante edition, and you with double what is extractable during my lifetime."

"I have a strong presentiment that (batting some out-of-the-way accident) you will survive me. The difference of eight years, or whatever it is between our ages, is nothing. I do not feel (no, indeed anxious to feel) the principles of life in me tend to longevity. My father and mother died, the one at thirty-five or six, and the other at forty-five; and Doctor Rush, or somebody else, says that nobody lives long, without having one parent, at least, an old stager."

"I should, to be sure, like to see out my eternal mother-in-law, not so much for her heritage, but from my natural antipathy. But the indulgence of this natural desire is too much to expect from the Providence who presides over old women. I bore you with all this about lives because it has been put in my way by a calculation of insurances which Murray has sent me. I remit you should have more, if I evaporate within a reasonable time."

"I wonder if my 'Cain' has got safe to England. I have written since about sixty stanzas of a poem, in octave stanzas, * (in the Pulpit style, which the fools in England think was invented by Whistcraft—it is as old as the hills in Italy,) called 'The Vision of Judgment, by Quevedo Redivivus,' with this motto—"

"* A Daniel come to just punish, you, a Daniel;"

"I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

"In this it is my intent to put the said George's Apotheosis in a Whig point of view, not forgetting the Poet Laureate for his preface and his other demerits."

"I am just got to the pass where Saint Peter, hearing that the royal defunct had opposed Catholic Emancipation, rises up, and, interrupting Satan's oration, declares he will change places with Cerberus sooner than let him into heaven, while he has the keys thereof."

"I must go and ride, though rather feverish and chilly. It is the ague season; but the agues do me rather good than harm. The feel after the fit is as if one had got rid of one's body for good and all."

"The gods go with you!—Address it to yours."

"Ever yours,

"P. S. Since I came back I feel better, though I stayed out too late for this malaria season, under the thin crescent of a very young moon, and got off my horse to walk in an avenue with a Signora for an hour. I thought of you and...

LETTER DXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

October 25, 1821.

If the errors are in the MS., write me down as: they are sent, and I am content to undergo any penalty if they be. Besides, the enclosed MS. (last but one or two,) sent afterward, was that in the MS. too?

As to 'honor,' I will trust no man's honor in affairs of this kind. I will tell you why: a bargain is Hobbes's 'state of nature—a state of war.' It is so with all men. If I come to a friend, and say, 'Friend, lend me five hundred pounds;'—he either says yes, or says that he can't or won't; but if I come to Ditto, and say, 'Ditto, I have an excellent house, or horse, or carriage, or MSS., or books, or pictures, or &c., &c., &c., honestly worth a thousand pounds, you shall have them for five hundred, what does Ditto say? why, he looks at them, he hums, he hums, &c., if he can, to get a bargain as cheaply as he can, because it is a bargain. This is in the blood and bone of mankind; and the same man who would lend you another a thousand pounds without interest, would not buy a horse of him for half its value if he could help it. It is so: there's no denying it; and therefore I will have as much as I can, and you will give as little; and there's an end. All men are intrinsically Ditto's, and I am only sorry that, not being a dog, I can't bite them.

I am filling another book for you with little anecdotes, to my own knowledge, or well authenticated, of Sheridan, Curran, &c., and such other public men as I recollect to have been acquainted with, for I knew most of them, more or less. I will do what I can to prevent your losing your obsequies.

Yours, &c.

LETTER DXXII.

TO MR. ROGERS.

October 21, 1821.

I shall be (the gods willing) in Bologna on Saturday next. This is a curious answer to your letter; but I have taken a house in Pisa for the winter. As which all my chattels, furniture, horse, carriages, and live stock are already removed, and I am preparing to follow.

The cause of this removal is, shortly, the exile or proscription of all my friends' relations and connections here into Tuscany, on account of our late politics; and where they go, I accompany them. I merely remained till now to settle some arrangements about my daughter, and to give time for my furniture, &c., to precede me. I have not here a seat or a bed hardly, except some jury chairs, and tables, and a mattress, for the week to come.

If you will go on with me to Pisa, I can lodge you for as long as you like, (they write that the house, the Palazzo Lanfranchi, is spacious: it is on the Arno;) and I have four carriages, and as many saddle horses, (such as they are in these parts,) with all other conveniences—your command, as also their owner. If you could do this, we may, at least, cross the Apennines together; or if you are going by another road, we shall meet at Bologna, I hope. I address this to the post-office, (as you desire,) and you will know it when you see me again in Pisa, or in Marco. If you arrive first, wait till I come up, which will be (barring accidents) on Saturday or Sunday at farthest.

I presume you are alone in your voyages. Moore lives in London incognito., according to my latest advices from those climates.

It is better than a lustre, (five years and six months, and some days, more or less;) since we met; and, like the man from Tudela in the favo...
LETTER DXXXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Barcelona, Oct. 28, 1817.

"'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock, and in three hours more I have set out to walk on my way—sitting up all night to be sure of rising. I have just made them take off my bed-clothes—blankets inclusive—in case of temptation from the apparel of sheets to my eyelids. Samuel Rogers is—or is to be—at Bologna, as he writes from Venice.

"I thought our Magnífico would 'pound you,' it possible. He is trying to 'pound' me, too: but I'll specie the rogue—or, at least, I'll have the odd shillings out of him in keen amiable.

"Your approbation of 'Sardanapalus' is agreeable, for more reasons than one. Hobhouse is pleased to think as you do of it, and so do some others—but the 'Arimsipan,' whom, like a gryphon in the wilderness, I will 'follow for his gold,' (as I exerted you to do before,) did or do disapprove it—stinting me in my sizings.' His notible opinions on the 'Foscarì' and 'Cain' he hath not as yet forwarded; or, at least, I have not yet received them, nor the proofs thereof, though promised by last post.

"I see the way that he and his Quarterly people are tending—they want a row with me, and they shall have it. I only regret that I am not in Egypt, and for the nonce; as, here, it is hardly fair ground for me, isolated and out of the way of prompt rejoinder and information, as I am. But, though backed by all the corruption, and infamy, and panegyric of their master rogues and slave renegades, if they do once rouse me up,

"They had better call the devil, Staleybury.'

"I have that for two or three of them, which they had better not move me to put in motion; and yet, after all, what a fool I am to disquitish myself about such fellows! It was all very well ten or twelve years ago, when I was a 'curled darling,' and minded such things. At present, I rate them at their true value; but, from natural temper and bile, am not able to keep quiet.

"Let me hear from you on your return from Ireland, which ought to be shamed to see you, after Brunswick blarney. I am of Longman's opinion, that you should allow your friends to liquidate the Bermuda claim. Why should you throw away the two thousand pounds (of the non-guineas Murray) upon that cursed prize of treacherous infringement? I think you can make the matter a little too far and scrupulously. When we see patriots begging 'liberally, and know that Grattan received a fortune from his country, I really do not see why a man, in no what inferior to any or all of them, should shrink from accepting that assistance from his private friends, which every tradesman receives from his connexions upon much less occasions. For, after all, it was not your debt—it was a piece of swindling against you. As to * * *, and the 'what noble creatures,' &c., &c., it is all very fine and very well, but till you can persuade me that there is no credit and no self-applause to be obtained by being of use to a celebrated man, I must retain the same opinion of the human species, which I do of our Friend Mr. Specie.
writing them was enough; you may spare me that of a perusal. Mr. Moore has (or may have) a discretionary power to omit any repetition or expressions which do not seem good to him, who is a better judge of such matters than I.

"Enclosed is a lyrical drama, (entitled 'A Mystery,' from its subject,) which, perhaps, may arrive in time for the volume. You will find it pious enough, I trust—at least some of the chorus might have been written by Sternhold and Hopkins themselves for that, and perhaps for melody. As it is longer, and more lyrical and Grecian than I intended at first, I have not divided it into acts, but called what I have sent Part First, as there is a suspension of the action, which may perhaps be closed there without impropriety, or be continued in a way that I have in view. I wish the first part to be published before the second, because, if it don't succeed, it is better to stop there than to go on in a fruitless experiment.

"I desire you to acknowledge the arrival of this packet by return of post, if you can conveniently, with a proof of your obedience, &c.

"P.S. My wish is to have it published at the same time, and, if possible, in the same volume, with the others, because, whatever the merits or demerits of these pieces may be, it will perhaps be allowed that each is of a different kind, and in a different style; so that, including the prose, and the Don Juans, &c., I have at least sent you variety during the last year or two."

LETTER DXXXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Fitz, Nov. 16, 1811.

"There is here Mr. Taaffe, an Irish genius, with whom we are acquainted. He hath written a really excellent commentary on Dante, full of new and true information, and much ingenuity. But his verse is such as it hath pleased God to endue him with. Nevertheless, he is so firmly persuaded of its equal excellence, that he won't divorce the commentary from the tradition, as I ventured delicately to hint, and not having the fear of Ireland before my eyes, and upon the presumption of not having shone very well in his presence (with common pistols, too, not with my Manton's) the day before.

"But he is eager to publish all, and must be gratified, though the reviewers will make him suffer more tortures than there are in his original. Indeed, the notes are well worth publication; but he insists upon the translation for company, so that they will come out together, like Lady C * * * e charpering Miss * * * I read a letter of yours to him yesterday, and he begs me to write to you about his possible.—He is a really good fellow, I suppose, and I dare say that his verse is very good Irish.

"Now, what shall we do for him? He says that he is free of part of the original publisher. He will never rest till he is published and abused— for he has a high opinion of himself—and I see nothing left but to gratify him so as to have him blessed as little as possible; for I think it would kill him. You must write, then, to Jeffrey to beg him not to review him, and I will do the same to Gifford, through Murray. Perhaps they might notice the comment without touching the text. But I doubt the book—the text is too tempting.

"I have to thank you again, as I believe I did before, for your opinion of 'Cain,' &c. You may allow—no, too selfish claim; but I do not see why you should repay him out of your legacy—at least not yet. If you feed about it, (as you are ticklish on such points,) pay him the interest now, and the principal when you are strong in cash; or pay him by instalments; or pay him as I do my creditors—that is, not till they make me.

"I address this to you at Paris, as you desire.

"Reply soon, and believe me ever, &c.

"P. S. What I wrote to you before was wrong; spirits is however, very true. At present, owing to the cli mate, &c., (I can walk down into my garden, and pluck my own oranges, and, by-the-way, have a diarism consequence of indulging in this me ridian luxury of proprietorship,) my spirits are much better. You seem to think that I could not have written the 'Vision,' &c., under the influence of low spirits—but I think there you err. A man's righteousness, or, more properly, his spirit, has no more to do with the every-day individual than the Inspiration with the Pythons when removed from her tripod."

To Lord Byron.

"Ferne, Somerset, Nov. 21, 1811.

"MY LORD,

"More than two years since, a lovely and beloved wife was taken from me, by lingering disease, after a very short union. She possessed unvarying gentleness and fortitude, and a piety so retiring as rarely to let me indulge in any expression of the pain as to produce uniform benevolence of conduct. In the last hour of life, after a farewell look on a lately born and only infant, for whom she had evinced unexpressible affection, her last whispers were, 'God's happiness! God's happiness!' Since the second anniversary of her decease, I have read some papers which no one had seen during her life, and which contain her most secret thoughts. I am induced to write to thee, and to pass from these papers, which, there is no doubt, refers to yourself; as I have more than once heard the writer mention your agility on the rocks at Hastings."

"Oh, my God, I take encouragement from the assurance of Thy Word, to pray to thee in behalf of one for whom I have lately been much interested. May the person to whom I allude (and who is now, we fear, as much distinguished for his neglect of thee as for the transcendent talents Thou hast bestowed on him) be awakened to a sense of his own danger, and led to seek that peace of mind, in a proper religion, which he has found this world's enjoyments unable to procure! Do Thou grant, that his future example may be productive of far more extensive benefit than his past conduct and writing have been of evil; and may the Sun of Righteousness, which we trust will, at some period, arise on him, be bright in proportion to the darkness of those clouds which guilt has raised around him, and the balm which it bestows, healing and soothing in proportion to the keenness of that agony which the punishment of his vices has inflicted on him! May the hope that the sincerity of my own efforts for the attainment of holiness, and the approach of my own love to the great Author of holiness, will render the prayer, and every other for the welfare of mankind, more efficacious. Cheer me in the path of duty;—but let me not forget, that, while we are permitted to animate ourselves to exertion by every innocent motive, these are but the lesser streams which may serve to increase the current, but which, deprived of the grand fountain of good, (a deep conviction of inborn sin, and firm belief in the atonement of Christ's death, the assurance of those who trust in him, and really wish to serve him,) would soon dry up, and leave us barren of every virtue as before."

how deep and expansive a concern for the happiness of others the Christian faith can awaken in the midst of youth and prosperity. Here is nothing poetical and splendid, as in the expostulatory homage of M. Delamarre; but here is the sublime, my lord; for this intervention was, on you account, to the supreme Sense of happiness. It sprang from a faith more confirmed than that of the French poet; and from a charity which, in combination with faith, showed its power unimpaired amid the last acts and purgation of declining dissolution. I will hope that a prayer, which I am sure, was deeply sincere, may not be always unavailing.

"It would add nothing, my lord, to the fame with which your genius has surrounded you, for an unknown and obscure individual to express his admiration of it. I had rather be numbered with those who wish and pray, that 'wisdom from above,' and 'peace,' and 'joy,' may enter such a mind."

"JOHN SHEPARD."

LETTER DXXXVII.

TO MR. SHEPARD.

"Pan, December 8, 1821.

"SIR,

"I have received your letter. I need not say, that the extract which it contains has affected me, because it would imply a want of all feeling to have read it with indifference. Though I am not quite sure that it was intended by the writer for me, yet the date, the place where it was written, with some other circumstances that you mention, render the allusion probable. But for whomsoever it was meant, I have read it with all the pleasure which can arise from so melancholy a topic. I say pleasure—because your brief and simple picture of the life and demeanor of the excellent person whom I trust you will again meet, cannot be contemplated without the admiration due to her virtues and her pure and unpretending piety. Her, last moments were particularly striking; and I do not know that, in the course of reading the story of mankind, and still less in my observations upon the existing portion, I ever met with any thing so unostentatiously beautiful. Indisputably, the firm believers in the gospel have a great and sincere regard for others, for this simple reason, that, if true, they will have their reward hereafter; and if there be no hereafter, they can be with the infidel in his eternal sleep, having had the assistance of an exalted hope, through life, without subsequent disappointment, since (at the worst for them) 'out of nothing, nothing can arise,' not even sorrow. But a man's creed does not depend upon himself: who can say, I will believe this, that, or the other? and, least of all, that which he least can comprehend. I have, however, observed, that those who have begun life with extreme faith, have in the end greatly narrowed it, as Chillingworth, Clarke, (who ended as an Arian,) Bayle, and Gibbon, (once a Catholic,) and others; while, on the other hand, nothing is more common than for the early skeptic to end in a firm belief, like Manulpuis and Henry Kirk White.

"But my business is to acknowledge your letter, and not to make a dissertation. I am obliged to you for your good wishes, and more than obliged by the extract from the papers of the beloved object whose qualities you have so well described in a few words. I can assure you, that all the fame which ever cheated humanity into higher notions of its own importance would never weigh in my mind against the pure and pious interest which a virtuous being may be allowed to take in my welfare. In this point of view, I would not exchange the prayer of the deceased in my behalf for the united glory of Homer, Caesar, and Napoleon, could such be accomplished upon a living head. Do me at least the justice to suppose, that 'Vide meliora prosequor,' however the 'deteriora sequor,' may have been applied to my conduct.

"I have the honor to be,

"Your obliged and obedient servant,

"BYRON.

"P. S. I do not know that I am addressing a clergyman; but I presume that you will not be affected by the mistake (if it is one) on the address of this letter. One who has so well explained, and deeply felt the doctrines of religion, will excuse the error which led me to believe him its minister."

LETTER DXXXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Pan, December 4, 1821.

"By extracts in the English papers,—in your holy ally, Galignani's 'Messenger,'—I perceive that 'the two greatest examples of human vanity in the present age' are firstly, 'the ex-emperor Napoleon, and, secondly, his lordship, &c... the noble poet,' meaning your humble servant, 'poor guiltless.'

"Poor Napoleon! he little dreamed, to what vile comparisons the turn of the wheel would reduce him!

"I have got here into a famous old feudal palazzo, on the Arno, large enough for a garrison, with dungeons below and cells in the walls, and so full of ghosts that the learned Fletcher (my valet) has begged leave to change his room, and then refused to occupy his new room, because there were more ghosts there than in the other. It is quite true that there are most extraordinary noises, (as in all old buildings,) which have terrified the servants so as to incommodate me extremely. There is one place where people were evidently walled up, for there is but one possible passage, broken through the wall, and then meant to be closed again upon the inmate. The house belonged to the Lanfranchi family, (the same mentioned by UgoIino in his dream, as his persecutor with Sienaiti,) and has had a fierce owner or two in its time. The staircase, &c., is said to have been built by Michel Angelo. It is not yet cold enough for a fire. What a climate!

"I am, however, bothered about these spectres, (as they say the last occupants were,) for I have as yet seen nothing, nor, indeed, heard (myself); but all the other ears have been regaled by all kinds of supernatural sounds. The first night I thought I heard an odd noise, but it has not been repeated. I have now been here more than a month.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DXXXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Pan, December 10, 1821.

"This day and this hour, (one, on the clock,) my daughter is six years old. I wonder when I shall see her again, or if ever I shall see her at all.

"I have remarked a curious coincidence, which almost looks like a fatality.

"My mother, my wife, my daughter, my half-sister, my sister's mother, my natural daughter, (as far at least as I am concerned,) and myself, are all only children.

"My father, by his first marriage with Lady Cowper, (an only child,) had only my sister; and by his second marriage with an only child, an only child again. Lady Byron, as you know, was one also, and so is my daughter, &c.

"Is not this rather odd—such a complication of only children? By-the-way, send me my daughter Ada's miniature. I have only the print, which gives little or no idea of her complexion.

"Yours, &c.,

"B."

LETTER DXI.

"Pisa, December 13, 1821.

"What you say about Galignani's two biographies is very amusing; and, if I were not lazy, I would certainly do what you desire. But I doubt my present stock of facetiousness—that is, of good serious humor, so as not to let the cat out of the bag.* I wish you would undertake it. I will forgive and indulge you (like a pope) beforehand, for any thing ludicrous, that might keep those fools in their own dear belief that a man is a true genius.

"I suppose I told you that the Glaiour story had actually some foundation on facts; or, if I did not, you will one day find it in a letter of Lord Sligo's. We were all for the publication of the poem. I would not like to see it rest upon any account of my own, and shall say nothing about it. However, the real incident is still remote enough from the poetical one, being just such as, happening to a man of any imagination, might suggest such a composition. The worst of any real adventures is, that they involve living people—else Mrs. —'s, &c., are as 'German to the matter' as Mr. Maturin should desire for his novels.

"The consumption you mentioned for poor Taafe was near taking place yesterday. Riding pretty sharply after Mr. Medwin and myself, in the turning of the corner of a lane between Pisa and the hills, he was split,—and, besides losing some claret on the spot, bruised himself a good deal, but is in no danger. He was bled, and keeps his room. As I sat a-head of him some hundred yards, I did not see the accident; but my servant, who was behind, did, and, says the horse did not fall—the usual excuse of floored equestrians. As Taafe piques himself upon his horsemanship, and his horse is really a pretty horse enough, I long for personal gratitude,—as I never yet met the man who would fairly claim a tumble as his own property."

"Could not you send me a printed copy of the 'Irish Avatar'?—I do not know what has become of Rogers since we parted at Florence.

"Don't let the Angles keep you from writing. Sam told me that you were somewhat dissipated in Paris, which I can easily believe. Let me hear from you at your best leisure.

"Ever, and truly, &c.

"P. S. December 13.

"I enclose you some lines, written not long ago which you may do what you like with, as they are very harmless.† Only, if copied or printed, or set, I could wish it more correctly than in the usual way, in which one's 'nothing's are monstered,' as Coriolanus says.

"You must really get Taafe published—he never will rest till he is so. He is just gone with his broken head to Lucca, at my desire, to try to save a man from being burnt. The Spanish, * * *, that has her peticoats over Lucca, had actually condemned a poor devil to the stake, for stealing the wafer-box out of a church. Shelley and I, of course, were up in arms against this piece of piety, and have been disturbing every body to get the sentence changed. Taafe is gone to see what can be done.

LETTER DXLIII.

TO SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.

MY DEAR SIR WALTER,

"I need not say how grateful I am for your letter, but I must own my ingratitude in not having written to you again long ago. Since I left England, (and it is not for all the usual terms of transportation,) I have scribbled to five hundred blockheads on business, &c., without difficulty, though with no great pleasure; and yet, with the notion of addressing you a hundred times, in my head and always in my heart, I have not done what I ought to not only for your sake, but it seems to be the sacred principle of tremulous anxiety with which one sometimes makes love to a beautiful woman of our own degree, with whom one is enamored in good earnest; whereas we attack a fresh colored housemaid (I speak, of course, of earlier times) with any sentiments tal remorse or mitigation of our virtuous purpose.

"I owe to you far more than the usual obligation for the courtesy of literature and common friendship, for you went out of your way in 1817 to do me a service, when it required not merely kindness, but courage to do so; to have been recorded by you in such a manner would have been a proud memorial to me alone. I was at this time, 'all a world and my wife,' as the proverb goes, were trying to trample upon me, was something still higher to my self-esteem,—I allude to the Quarterly Review of the third canto of Childe Harold, which Murray told me was written by you,—and indeed, I should have known it without his information, as there could not be two who could and would have done this at the time. Had it been a common criticism, however eloquent or panegyrical, I should have felt pleased, undoubtedly, and grateful, but not to the extent which the extraordinary good-heartedness of the whole proceeding must induce in any mind capable of emotions. The very cordliness of this acknowledgment will, at least show that I have not forgotten the obligation; and I can assure you that my sense of it has been out at compound interest during the delay. I shall only add one word upon the subject, which is, that I think that you, and Jeffrey, and Leigh Hunt, were the only literary men, of numbers whom I know, (and some of whom I have served,) who dared venture even an anonymous word in my favor just then; and of those three, I had never seen one at all,—of the second much less than I desired,—and that the third was under no kind of obligation to me whatever; while the other two had been actually attacked by me on a former occasion; one, indeed, with some provocation, but the other wantonly enough. So you see you have been heaping 'coals of fire,' &c., in the true gospel manner, and I can assure you that I have been burning them down to my own heart.

"I am glad that you accepted the inscription. I meant to have inscribed 'the Foscarini' to you instead; but first, I heard that 'Cain' was thought the least bad of the two as a composition; and, 2dly, I have always supposed that a piece of paper, in a note to the Foscarini, and I recollected that he is a friend of yours, (though not of mine,) and that it would not be the handsome thing to dedicate to one friend what I was bored with retaining such matters about another. However, I'll work the Laureate before I have done with him, as soon as I can muster Bilingsgate therefor. I like a row, and always did from a boy, in the course of which propensity, I must needs say, that I have found it the most easy of all to be gratified, personally and poetically. You disclaim 'jealousies,' but I would ask, as Boswell did of Johnson, 'of whom could you be jealous,' of none of the living, certainly, and (taking all and all into consideration) of which of the dead? I don't like to bore you about the Scotch novels, (as they call them, though two of them are wholly in English, and I regret half so,) but nothing can or could ever persuade me, since I was the first ten minutes in your company, that you are not the man. To me those novels have so much of 'Auld lang syne,' (I was bred a canny Scot till ten years old) that I never move without them; and when I removed from Ravenna to Pisa, the other day, and sent on my library before, they were the only books that I kept by me, although I already have them by heart.

"January 7, 1822.

"I delayed till now concluding, in the hope that I should have got 'the Pirate,' who is now under way for me, but has not yet hove in sight. I hear that your diligence (which I suppose by this time you are half a grandfather,—a young one, by-the-way. I have heard great things of Mrs. Lockhart's personal and mental charms, and much good of her lord: that you may live to see as many novel Scotts as are mare or less of Scotty novel's, is a very bad pun, but sincere wish of Yers ever most affectionately, &c.

"P. S. Why don't you take a turn in Italy? You would find yourself as well known and as well come as in the Highlands among the natives. As for the English you would be with them as in London; and I need not add, that I should be delighted to see you again, which is far more than I shall ever feel or say for England, or (with a few exceptions of kith, kin, and allies) any thing that it contains. But my 'heart wars to the tartan,' or to any thing of Scotland, which reminds me of Aberdeen and other parts, not so far from the Highlands as that town, about Invercauld and Braemar, where I was sent to drink goat's fey in 1795-6, in consequence of a threatened decline after the scarlet fever. But I am gosspilling; so, good night,—and the good night,—pray present my respects to Lady Scott, who may perhaps recollect having seen me in town in 1814.

"I see that one of your supporters (for, like Sir Hildebrand, I am fond of Gullin) is a mermaid; it is my crest too, and with precisely the same curl of tail. There's concatenation for you!—I am building a little cutter at Genoa, to go a cruising in the summer. I know you like the sea too."

LETTER DXLIV.

TO DOUGLAS KINNAIRD.

"Pisa, February 9, 1822.

"'Try back the deep lane,' till we first a publisher for 'the Vision;' and if none such is to be found, print fifty copies at my expense, distribute them among my acquaintance, and you will soon see that the booksellers will publish them, even if we oppose them. That they are now afraid is natural; but I do not see that I ought to give way on that account. I know nothing of Rioting's 'red monstrosity' by the eminent Churchman, but I suppose he wants a living. I once heard a preacher at Kentish Town against 'Cain.' The same outcry was raised against Priestly, Hume,

BYRON'S WORKS.

Gib on, Voltaire, and all the men who dared to put tithes to the question.

"I have got Southey's pretended reply, to which I am surprised that you do not allude. What remains to be done is, to call him out. The question is, would he come? for, if he would not, the whole thing would appear ridiculous, if I were to take a long and expensive journey to no purpose."

"You must be my second, and, as such, I wish to consult you.

"I apply to you as one well versed in the duello, or monomachie. Of course I shall come to England as a sensible man, to avenge me (supposing that I was the survivor) in the same manner: having no other object which could bring me to that country except to settle quarrels accumulated during my absence."

"By the last post I transmitted to you a letter upon some Rochdale toll business, from which there are moneys in prospect. My agent says two thousand pounds, but supposing it to be only one, or even one hundred, still they be moneys; and I have lived long enough to have an exceeding respect for the smallest current coin of any realm, or the least sum, which, although I may not want it myself, may do something for others who may need it more than I."

"They say that 'Knowledge is Power; '-I used to think so; but I now know that they meant 'money!' and when Socrates declared, 'that all he knew was, that he knew nothing,' he merely intended to declare, that he had not a drachm in the Athenian world.

"The circulars are arrived, and circulating like the vortices (or vortexes) of Descartes. Still I have a due care of the needful, and keep a look-out ahead, as my notions upon the score of moneys coincide with yours, and with all men's who have lived to see that every guinea is a philosopher's stone, or at least his touch-stone. You will doubt me less, when I pronounce my firm belief, that Cash is Virtue."

"I cannot reproach myself with much expenditure: my only extra expense (and it is more than I have spent upon myself) being a loan of two hundred and fifty pounds to Hunt; and fifty pounds' worth of furniture which I have bought for him; and a boat which I am building for myself at Genoa, which will cost about a hundred pounds more.

"But to return. I am determined to have all the moneys I can, whether by my own funds, or succession, or lawsuit, or MSS., or any lawful means whatsoever.

"I will pay (though with the sincerest reluctance) my remaining creditors, and every man of law, by instishments from the award of the arbitrators.

"I recommend to you the notice in Mr. Hanson's letter, on the demand of moneys for the Rochdale toills.

"Above all, I recommend my interests to your honorable worship.

"Recollect, too, that I expect some moneys for the various MSS., (no matter what;) and, in short, Rem, quocunque modo, Rem!'-the noble feeling of culpity grows upon us with our years.

"Yours eye, &c."

LETTER DXLV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Pax, Feb. 9, 1822.

"Attacks upon me were to be expected, but I perceive one among you in the papers, which I confess that I did not expect. How, or in what manner, you can be considered responsible for what I publish, I am at a loss to conceive.

"If 'Cain' be blaspheous', Paradise Lost is blasphemous; and the very words of the Oxford gentleman, 'Evil, be thou my good,' are from that very poem, from the mouth of Satan; and is there any thing in the fate of Lucifer in the Mystery; Cain is nothing more than a dramatized argument. If Lucifer and Cain speak as the first murderer and the first rebel may be supposed to speak, surely all the rest of the personages talk also, according to their characters—and stronger passions have ever been percutted to the drama.

"I have even avoided introducing the Deity as in Scripture, (though Milton does, and not very wisely either,) but have rather sent to Cain instead, on purpose to avoid shocking any feelings on the subject by falling short of what all uninspired men must fall short in, viz., giving an adequate notion of the effect of the presence of Jehovah. The old Mysteries introduced him liberally enough, and all this is avoided in the new one.

"The attempt to bully you, because they think it won't succeed with me, seems to me as atrocious an attempt as ever disgraced the times. What! when Gibbon's, Hume's, Priestley's, and Drummond's publishers have been allowed to rest in peace for seventy years, are you to be singled out for a work of fiction, not of history or argument? There must be something at the bottom of this—some private enemy of your own: it is otherwise incredible.

"I can only say, 'Me, me; en adama qui fece;'—that any proceeding directed against you, I beg, may be transferred to me, who am willing, and ought, to endure them all; that if you have lost money by the publication, I will refund any or all of the copyright; that I desire you will say that both you and Mr. Gifford rennounced against the publication, as also Mr. Hobhouse; that I alone occasioned it, and I alone am the person who, either legally or otherwise, should bear the burden. If they prosecute, I will come to England—that is, may be transferred to me, who am willing, and yours. Let me know. You can't suffer for me, if I can help it. Make any use of this letter you please.

"P. S. I write to you about all this row of bad passions and absurdities, with the summer moon (for here our winter is clearer than your dog-days) lighting the winding Arno, with all her buildings and bridges,—so quiet and still!—What nothings are we before the least of these stars!"

LETTER DXLVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Pax, Feb. 19, 1822.

"I am rather surprised not to have had an answer to my letter and packets. Lady Noel is dead, and it is not impossible that I may have to go to England to settle the division of the Wentworth property, and what portion Lady B. is to have of it; all which was left undecided by the articles of separation. But I hope not, if it can be done without,—and I have written to Sir Francis Bertie to say this may be done in your name, as (as you are reporter) he knows the property.

"Continue to address here, as I shall not go if I can avoid it—at least, not on that account. But I may on another; for I wrote to Douglas Kinnaid to convey a message of invitation to come to meet me, either in England, or (as less liable to interruption) on the coast of France. This was about a fortnight ago, and I have not yet had time to have the answer. However, you shall have due notice therefore continue to address to Pisa.

"My agents and trustees have written to me to desire that I would take the name directly, so that I am yours very truly and affectionately, and merely know, from some abuse in that faithful ex and de-tractor, Galgani, that the clergy are up against 'Cain.' There is (if I am not mistaken) some good church preferment on the Wentworth estates; and I will show them what a good Christian I am by patronising and preferring the most pious of their order, should opportunity occur.

"M. and I am but little in correspondence, and I know nothing of literary matters at present. I have been writing on business only lately. What are you about? Be assured that there is no such coalition as you apprehend."

LETTER DXLV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Plas, Feb. 28, 1822.

"Your letter arrived since I wrote the enclosed. It is not likely, as I have appointed agents and arbitrators for the Noel estates, that I should proceed to England on that account,—though I may upon another, within stated. At any rate, continue you to address here till you hear further from me. I could wish you still to arrange for me, either with a London or Paris publisher, for the things, &c. I shall not quarrel with any arrangement you may please to make.

"I have appointed Sir Francis Burdett my arbitrator to decide on Lady Byron's allowance out of the Noel estates, which are estimated at seven thousand a year, and rents very well paid,—a rare thing at this time. It is, however, owing to their consisting chiefly in pasture lands, and therefore less affected by corn bills, &c., than properties in tillage.

"Believe me yours ever most affectionately,

"NOEL BYRON."

"Between my own property in the funds, and my wife's in land, I do not know which side to cry out on in politics.

"There is nothing against the immorality of the soul in 'Cain' that I recollect. I hold no such opinions;—but, in a drama, the first rebel and the first murderer must be made to talk according to their characters. However, the persons are all preaching at it, from Kentish Town and Oxford to Plas;—the soundings of priests, who do more harm to religion than all the infidels that ever forgot their catechism.

"I have not seen Lady Noel's death announced in Galgani. —How is that?"

LETTER DXLVIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Plas, Feb. 28, 1822.

I begin to think that the packet (a heavy one) of five acts of 'Werner,' &c., can hardly have reached you, for your letter of last week (which I answered) did not allude to it, and yet I insured it at the post-office here.

"I have no direct news from England, except on the Noel business, which is proceeding quietly, as I have appointed a gentleman (Sir F. Burdett) for my arbitrators. This too, or the persons are all recalling the lawyer whom they had chosen, and will name a gentleman too. This is better, as the arrangement of the estates and of Lady's B.'s allowance will thus be settled without quibbling.

My lawyers are taking out a license for the name and arms, which it seems I am to endue.

"By another, and indirect quarte., I hear that 'Cain' has been pirated, and that the Chancellor has refused to give Murray any redress. Also, that G. R. * (your friend 'Ben'), has expressed great personal indignation at the said pirating. As I am curious enough, I think,—after allowing Priestly, Hume, and Gibbon, and Bolingbrooke, and Voltaire, to be published, without depriving the booksellers of their rights. I heard from Rome a day or two ago, and, with what truth I know not what that * * * " Yours, & c"
BYRON'S WORKS.

LETTER DL.

TO MR. MOORE.

"P. M., March 4, 1822.

"Since I wrote the enclosed, I have waited another post, and now have your answer acknowledging the arrival of the packet—a troublesome one. I fear, to you in more ways than one, both from weight external and internal.

"The unpublished things in your hands, in Douglas K.'s, and Mr. John Murray's, are, 'Heaven and Earth, a lyrical kind of Drama upon the Deluge,' &c.;—'Werner,' now with you;—a translation of the first canto of the Morgante Maggiore;—ditto of an Episode in Dante;—some stanzas to the Po, June 1st, 1819;—Hints from Horace, written in 1811, but a good piece, since, to be omitted;—several prose things, which may, perhaps, as well remain unpublished;—The Vision, &c., of Quevedo Redivivus in verse.

"Here you see is 'more matter for a May morning;' but how much of this can be published is for consideration. Quevedo (one of my best in that line) that has appalled the Row already, and must take its chance at Paris, if at all. The new Mystery is less speculative than 'Cain,' and very pious; besides, it is chiefly lyrical. The Morgante is the benefit of that edition that was or will be made; and the rest are—whatever you please to think them.

"I am sorry you think Werner even approaching to any fitness for the stage, with my notions upon it, is very far from my present object. With regard to the publication, I have already explained that I have no exorbitant expectations of either fame or profit in the present instances; but wish them purely because they are written, which is the common feeling of all scribblers.

"With respect to 'Religion,' can I never convince you that I have no such opinions as the characters in that drama, which seems to have frightened every body? Yet they are nothing to the expressions in Goethe's Faust, (which are ten times harder,) and not a whit more bold than those of Milton's Satan. My ideas of a character my running away with me, like all imaginative men, I, of course, embody myself with the character while I draw it, but not a moment after the pen is from off the paper.

"I am no enemy to religion, but the contrary. As a proof, I am educating my natural daughter a strict Catholic in a convent of Romagna, for I think people can never have enough of religion, if they are to have any. I incline, myself, very much to the Catholic doctrines; but if I am to write a drama, I must make my characters speak as I conceive them likely to argue.

"As to poor Shelley, who is another bugbear to you and the world, he is, to my knowledge, the least selfish and the mildest of men—a man who has made more sacrifices of his fortune and feelings for others than any I ever heard of. With his speculative opinions I have nothing in common, nor desire to have.

"The truth is, my dear Moore, you live near the store of society, where you are unavoidably influenced by its heat and its vapors. I did so once—and too much—sufficient to give a color to my whole future existence. As my success in society was not inconsiderable, I am sure not a prejudiced judge upon the subject, unless in its favor; but I think it, as now constituted, fatal to all great objects. I understand that you give me back my own feelings, and mine, and that is to try once more if I could do any good in politics; but not in the petty politics I see crowing upon our miserable country.

"Do not let me be misunderstood, however. I speak your own opinions, they have had, and will have, the greatest weight with me. But if you merely echo the 'monde,' (and it is difficult not to do so, being in its favor and its ferment,) I can only regret that you should ever repeat any thing to which I cannot pay attention.

"But I am prosing. The gods go with you, and as much immortality of all kinds as may suit your present and all other existence.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DLI.

"P. M., March 6, 1822.

"The enclosed letter from Murray hath melted me; though I think it is against his own interest to wish that I should continue his connexion. You may, therefore, send him the packet of 'Werner,' which will be of further trouble. And pray can you forgive me for the bare and expense I have already put upon you? At least, say so—for I feel ashamed of having given you so much for such nonsense.

"The fact is, I cannot keep my resentments, though violent enough in their onset. Besides, now that all the world are at Murray on my account, I neither can nor ought to leave him; unless, as I really thought, it were better for him that I should.

"I have had no other news from England except a letter from Barry Cornwall, the bard, and my old schoolfellow. Though I have sickened you with letters lately, believe me, yours, &c.

"P. S. In your last letter you say, speaking of Shelley, that you would almost prefer the 'damming bigot' to the 'annihilating infidel.' Shelley believes in immortality, however—but this by-the-way. Do you remember Frederick the Great's answer to the remonstrance of the villagers, whose curate preached against the eternity of hell's torments? It was thus:—'If my faith subjects of Schrausenhäuser prefer being eternally damned, let them!'

"Of the two, I should think the long sleep better than the agonized vigil. But men, miserable as they are, cling so to anything like life, that they probably will prefer damnation to quiet. Besides, they think themselves so important in the creation, that nothing less can satisfy their pride—the insects!'" squabble you had about Thorwaldsen's. Of my own I can hardly speak, except that it is thought very tike what I now am, which is different from what I was, of course, since you saw me. The sculptor is a famous one; and as it was done by his own particular request, will be done well, probably.

"What is to be done about Taaffe and his Commentary? He will die, if he is not published; he will be damned if he is; but that he don't mind.
We must publish him.

"All the row about me has no otherwise affected me than by the attack upon yourself, which is un-generous in Church and State: but as all violence must in time have its proportionate reaction, you will do better by and by."

"Yours very truly,
"Noel Byron."

LETTER DLI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Plas, March 8, 1822.

"You will have had enough of my letters by this time—yet one word in answer to your present mis-give. You are quite wrong in thinking that your advice had offended me; but I have already re-plated (if not corrected) on that ground."

"With regard to Murray, as I really am the meanest and mildest of men since Moses, (though the public and mine 'excellent wife' cannot find it out,) I had already pricked myself and subsided back to Albemarle street, as my yesterday's jest will have informed you. But I thought that I had explained my causes of bile—at least to you.

"Some instances of vacillation, occasional neg-lees, and trouble some since I resided or immig-ated, are sufficient to put your truly great author and man into a passion. But reflection, with some aid from hellebore, hath already cured me 'pro tempore;'
and, if it had not, a request from you and Hollhouse would have come upon me like two out of the 'tribus Anticyria,'—with which, however, Horace despairs of purging a post. I really feel ashamed of having bored you so frequently and fully of late. But what could I do? You are a friend—resent one, alas!
—and as I trust no one more, I trouble you in proportion.

"This war of 'Church and State' has astonished me more than it disturbs; for I really thought 'Cain'
'speculative and hardy, but still a harmless proaduction. As I said before, I am really a great admire of tangible religion: and am breeding one of my daughters a Catholic, that she may have her hands full. It is by far the most elegant worship, hardly excepting the Greek mythology. What with incense, pictures, statues, altars, shrines, relics, and the real presence, confession, absolution,—there is something sensible to grasp at. Besides, it leaves no possibility of doubt; for those who swallow their Deity really and truly, in transubstantiation, can hardly find any thing else easier than way of digestion."

"I am afraid that this sounds fippant, but I don't mean it to be so; only my turn of mind is so given to taking things in the absurd point of view, that it breaks out in spite of me every now and then. Still, I do assure you that I am a very good Christian. Whether you will believe me in this, I do not know; but I trust you will take my word for being 'very truly and affectionately yours, &c.'

"P. S. Do tell Murray that one of the conditions of peace is, that he shall publish the next volume (as within a publisher for) Taaffe's Commentary on Dante, against which there appears in the trade an unaccountable repugnance. It will make the man so exuberantly happy, as to make him have his 'excellent English p-day; and I have not the heart to tell him how the bibliopolar world shrinks from his Commentary;
—and yet it is full of the most orthodox religion and morality. In short, I make it a point that he shall be in print. He is such a good-natured, heavy * * Christian, that we must give him a show through the press. He naturally thirsts to be an author, and has been the happiest of men for (said two months, printing, correcting, collating, dating anticipating, and adding to his treasures of learning. Besides, he has had another fall from his horse into a ditch the other day, while riding on with me into the country.'

LETTER DLIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Plas, March 15, 1822.

"I am glad that you and your friends approve of my letter of the 8th ultimo. You may give it what publicity you think proper in the circumstances. I have since written to you twice or thrice.

"As to 'a poem in the old way,' I shall attempt of that kind nothing further. I follow the bias of my own mind, without considering whether men or men are or are not to be pleased: but this is nothing to my publisher, who must judge and act according to popularity.

"Therefore let the things take their chance: if they pay, you will pay me in proportion; and if they don't, I must.

"The Noel affairs, I hope, will not take me to England. I have no desire to revisit that country, unless it be to keep you out of a prison, (if this can be effected by my taking your place,) or perhaps to get myself into one, by exacting satisfaction from one or two persons who take advantage of my absence to abuse me. Further than this, I have no business nor connexion with English, nor desire to have, out of my own family, and friends, to whom I wish all prosperity. Indeed, I have lived upon the whole so little in England, (about five years since I was one-and-twenty,) that my habits are too continental, and your climate would please me as little as the society.

"I saw the Chancellor's Report in a French paper. Pray, why don't you prosecute the translation of Lucretius? or the original, with its Tannus Religio posuit audacem manus ."

"You must really get something done for Mr Taaffe's Commentary; what can I say to him?

"Yours, &c.

"Mr. Kinnaird writes that there has been an 'excellent defence' of 'Cain,' against 'Oxoniensis;' you have sent me no thing but not very excellent ear of the same poem. If there be such a 'Defender of the Faith,' you may send me his hundred articles, as a counterbalance to some of your late communications.

"Are you to publish, or not, what Moore and Mr.
Kinnaird have in hand, and the 'Vision of Judgment'? If you publish the latter in a very cheap collection, so as to baffle the pirates by a low price, you will find that it will do. The 'Mystery,' I look upon as good, and 'Werner' too, and I expect that you will publish them speedily. You need not put your name to Queroelo, but publish it as a foreign edition, and let it make its way. Douglas Kinnaird has it still, with the preface, I believe.

"I have received the Defence of 'Cain.' Who is my Warburton?—for he has done for me what the Bishop did for the poet against Crouch. His reply seems to me conclusive; and if you understood your own interest, you would print it together with the poem.

"It is very odd that I do not hear from you. I have forwarded to Mr. Douglas Kinnaird the documents on a squabble here, which occurred about a month ago. The affair is still going on; but they make nothing of it hitherto. I think, what with home and abroad, there has been hot water enough for one while. Mr. Dawkins, the English minister, has behaved in the handsomest and most gentlemanly manner throughout the whole business."

"You will regret to hear that I have received intelligence of the death of my daughter Allegra of a fever, in her eighteenth year. She was placed for the last year, to commence her education. It is a heavy blow for many reasons; but must be borne, with time.

"It is my present intention to send her remains to England for sepulture in Harrow church, (where I once hoped to have laid my own,) and this is my reason for troubling you with this notice. I wish the funeral to be very private. The body is embalmed, and in lead. It will be embarked from Leghorn. Would you have any objection to give the proper directions on its arrival?

"The blow was stunning and unexpected; for I thought the danger over, by the long interval between her stated amelioration and the arrival of the express. But I have borne up against it as I best can, and so far successfully, that I can go about the usual business of life with the same appearance of composure, and even greater. There is nothing to prevent your coming to-morrow; but, perhaps, to-day, and yester-evening, it was better not to have met. I do not know that I have anything to reproach in my conduct, and certainly nothing in my feelings and intentions towards the dead. But it is a moment when we are apt to think that, if this or that had been done, such event might have been prevented; though every day and hour shows us that they are the most natural and inevitable. I suppose that Time will do his usual work—Death has done his.

I read it over with some attention since it was published, and I think the time will come when it will be preferred to my other writings, though not immediately. I say this without irritation against the critics or criticism, whatever they may be, (for I have not seen them;) and nothing that has or may appear in Jeffrey's Review can make me forget that he stood by me for ten good years without any motive to do it but his own good-will.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Midlothian, May 29, 1822.

"New Langthorne.

"The body is embanked, in what ship I know not, neither could I enter into the details; but the Countess G. G. has had the goodness to give the necessary orders to Mr. Dunn, who superintends the embarkation, and will write to you. I wish it to be buried in the church.

"There is a spot in the churchyard, near the foot-path, on the brow of the hill looking towards Windsor, and a tomb under a large tree, (bearing the name of Peachie, or Peachey,) where I used to sit for hours and hours when a boy. This was my favorite spot; but as I wish to erect a tablet to her memory, the body had better be deposited in the church. Near the door, on the left hand as you enter, there is a monument with a tablet containing these words:—

"When Borew weeps o'er Virtue's sacred dust,
Our sons become us, and our grief is just:
Such were the tears she shed, who grateful pays
This last and tribute of her love and praise.'"

I recollect them, (after seventeen years,) not from any thing remarkable in them, but because from my seat in the gallery I had generally my eyes turned towards that monument. As near it as I could we Allegra to be tried, and on the wall a marble tablet placed, with these words:—

"In Memory of Allegra, Daughter of G. G. Lord Byron, who died at Bagna Cavallo, in Italy, April 20th, 1822, aged five years and three months.

"I shall go to her, but she shall not return to me.

"Old Samuel, xii. 23.

"The funeral I wish to be as private as is consistent with decency; and I could hope that Henry Drury will, perhaps, read the service over her. If he should decline it, it can be done by the usual minister for the time being. I do not know that I need add more just now.

"Since I came here, I have been invited by the Americans on board their squadron, where I was received with all the kindness which I could wish, and with more ceremony than I am fond of. I found them finer ships than your own of the same class, well manned and officered. A number of American gentlemen also were on board at the time, and some ladies. As I was taking leave, an American lady asked me for a rose which I wore, for the purpose, she said, of sending to America something which I had about me, as a memorial. I need not add that I felt the compliment properly. Captain Chauncey showed an American and very pretty edition of my poems, and offered me a passage to the United States, if I would go there Commodore Jones was also not less kind and attentive. I have since received the enclosed letter, directing me to sit for my picture for some Americans. It is singular that, in the same year that Lady Noel leaves by will an interdiction for my daughter to see her father's portrait for many years, the individuals of a nation not remarkable for their liking to the English in particular, nor for flattering men in general, request me to sit for my 'poutraiture,' as Baron Braddock calls it. I am also told of considerable literary honors in Germany. Goethe, Baron Braddock calls it. I am also told of considerable literary honors in Germany. Goethe, I am told, is my professed patron and protector. At Leipsic, this year, the highest prize was proposed for a translation of two cantos of Childe Harold. I am not sure that this was at Leipsic, but Mr. Rowcroft was my authority—a good German scholar, (a young American,) and an acquaintance of Goethe's.

"Goethe and the Germans are particularly fond of Don Juan, which they judge as a work of art as I had heard something of this before, through Lutzerode. The translations have been very frequent of several of the works, and Goethe made a comparison between Faust and Manfred.

"All this is some compensation for your English

but in the proofs: look at the dates and the MSS. themselves. Whatever faults they must spring from carelessness, and not from labor. They said the same of 'Lara,' which I wrote while undressing, after coming home from balls and masquerades in the year of revelry, 1814.

"Yours.

"June 9, 1822."

"You give me no explanation of your intention as to the 'Vision of Quevedo Redivivus,' one of my best things: indeed, you are altogether so abstruse and undecided lately, that I suppose you mean me to write 'John Murray, Esq., a Mystery,'—a composition which would not displease the clergy nor the trade. I by no means wish you to do what you don't like, but merely to say what you will do. The Vision must be published by some one. As to 'clamors,' the dice is cast; and 'come one, come all we will fight it out—at least one of us.'"

LETTER DLXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Monteone, near Leghorn, May 29, 1822.

I return you the proofs revised. Your printer has made one odd mistake:—'poor as a mouse,' instead of 'poor as a miser.' The expression may seem strange, but it is only a translation of 'semper avus eget.' You will add the Mystery, and publish as soon as you can. I care nothing for your 'season,' nor the blue approbations or disapprobations. All that is to be considered by you on the subject is as a matter of business; and if I square that to your notions, (even to the running the risk entirely myself,) you may permit me to choose my own time and mode of publication. With regard to the late volume, the present run against it or me may improve it for time, but it has the vital principle of permanency within it, as you may perhaps one day discover. I wrote to you on another subject a few days ago.

"Yours,

"N. B."

P. S. Please to send me the Dedication of Sardanapalus to Goethe. I shall prefix it to Werner, unless you prefer my putting another, stating that the former had been omitted by the publisher."

On the title-page of the present volume, put 'Published for the Author by J. M.'"

LETTER DLXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Monteone, near Leghorn, June 3, 1822.

I return you the revise of Werner, and expect the rest. With regard to the lines to the Po, perhaps you had better put them quietly in a second edition (if you reach one, that is to say) than in the first; because, though they have been reckoned fine, and I wish them to be preserved, I do not wish them to attract immediate observation, on account of the relationship of the lady to whom they are addressed with the first families in Romagna and the Marches.

The defender of 'Cain' may or may not be, as you term him, 'a tryo in literature;' however, I think both you and I are under great obligation to him. I have read the Edinburgh Review in Galigzani's Magazine, and have not yet decided whether to answer them or not; for, if I do, it will be difficult for me not 'to make sport for the Philistines,' by pulling down a house or two; since, when I once take pen in hand, I must say what comes uppermost, or fling it away. I have not the hypocrisv to pretend impartiality, nor the temper (as it is called) to keep always from saying what may not be pleasing to the hearer or reader. What do they mean by 'elaborate?' Why, you know that they were written as fast as I could put pen to paper, and printed from the original MSS., and never revised are those of negligence, and not of labor. I do not think this a merit, but it is a fact.

"Yours ever and truly,"

* N. B.

"P. S. You see the great advantage of my new signature: it may either stand for 'Nota Bene' or 'Noel Byron,' and, as such, will save much repetition, in writing either books or letters. Since I came here, I have been invited on board of the American squadron, and treated with all possible honor and ceremony. They have asked me to sit for my picture; and, as I was going away, an American lady took a rose from me, (which had been given to me by a very pretty Italian lady that very morning.) because she said, 'She was determined to send or take something which I had about me to America.' There is a kind of Lalla Rookh incident for you! However, all these American honors aside, perhaps, not so much from their enthusiasm for my 'poesie,' as their belief in my dislike to the English,—in which I have the satisfaction to coincide with them. I would rather, however, have a nod from an American, than a smug-box from an emperor."

LETTER DLXVI.

TO MR. ELICE.

"MY DEAR ELICE.

"It is a long time since I have written to you, but I have not forgotten your kindness, and I am now going to tax— I hope not too highly—but don't be alarmed, it is not a loan, but information which I am about to solicit. By your extensive connections, no one can have better opportunities of hearing the real state of South America—I mean Bolivar's country. I have many years had transatlantic projects of settlement, and what I could wish from you would be some information of the best course to pursue, and some letters of recommendation in case I should sail for Angostura. I am told that land is very cheap there; but though I have no great disposable funds to vest in such purchases, yet my income, such as it is, would be sufficient in any country, (except England,) for all the comforts of life, and for most of its luxuries. The war there is now over; and as I do not go there to speculate, but to settle without any views but those of independence and the enjoyment of the common civil rights, I should presume such an arrival would not be unwelcome.

"All I request of you is, not to discourage nor encourage, but to give me such a statement as you think prudent and proper. I do not address my other friends upon this subject, who would only throw obstacles in my way, and bore me to return to England; which I never will do, unless compelled by some insuperable cause. I have a quantity of furniture, books, &c., &c., which I could easily ship from Leghorn; but I wish to 'look before I leap' over the Atlantic. Is it true that for a few thousand dollars a large tract of land may be obtained? I speak of South America, recollect, I have read some publications on the subject, but they seemed violent and vulgar productions. Please to address your answer to me at this place, and believe me ever and truly yours, &c."

LETTER DLXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"I return you the revise. I have softened the part to which Gifford objected, and changed the name of Michael to Raphael, who was an angel of gentler sympathies. By-the-way, recollect to alter Michael to Raphael in the scene itself throughout, for I have only had time to do so in the list of the dramatica persons, and scratch out all the pencil marks, to avoid puzzling the printers. I have given the 'Vision of Queredo Rediviva' to John Hunt, which will relieve you from a dilemma. He must publish it at his own risk, as it is at his own desire. Give him the corrected copy which Mr. Kinnaird had, as it is mitigated partly, and also the preface.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DLXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Pis, July 6, 1825.

"Last week I returned you the packet of proofs. You had perhaps better not publish in the same volume the Po and Rimini translation.

"I have consigned a letter to Mr. John Hunt for the 'Vision of Judgment,' which you will hand over to him. Also the 'Pulei,' original and Italian, and any prose tracts of mine; for Mr. Leigh Hunt is arrived here and thinks of commencing real work, to which I shall contribute. I do not propose to you to be the publisher, because I know that you are unfriends; but all things in your care, except the volume in the press, which I could wish to be avoided in future, as they might be with a very little care, or a simple memorandum in your pocket-book.

"It is not impossible that I may have three or four cantos of Don Juan ready by autumn, or a little later, as I obtained a permission from my dictators to continue it,—provided always it was to be more guarded and decorous and sentimental in the continuation than in the commencement. Now, if all these conditions have been fulfilled may be seen, perhaps, by-and-by; but the embargo was only taken off upon these stipulations. You can answer at your leisure.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DLXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Pis, July 12, 1825.

"I have written to you lately, but not in answer to your last letter of about a fortnight ago. I wish to know (and request an answer to that point) what became of the stanzas to Wellington,* (intended to open a canto of Don Juan with,) which I sent you several months ago? If they have fallen into Murray's hands, he and the Tories will suppress them, as those lines rate here his real value. Pray be explicit on this, as I have no other copy, having sent you the original, and if you have them, let me have that again, or a copy correct."

"I subscribed at Leghorn two hundred Tuscan crowns to your Irishman committee: it is about a thousand francs, more or less. As Sir C. S., whoreceives that money and a part of his pay, could not afford more than a thousand livres out of his enormous salary, it would have appeared ostentatious in a private individual to pretend to..."

suppose; and therefore I have sent but the above sum, as you will see by the enclosed receipt.

"Leigh Hunt is here, after a voyage of eight months, during which he has, I presume, made the Pyramus and Thisbe, the Callaghan, and whatever much the same speed. He is setting up a Journal, to which I have promised to contribute; and in the first number the 'Vision of Judgment, by Quevedo.'

Can you give us any thing? He seems sanguine about the matter, but (entire nous) I am not. I do not, however, like to put him out of spirits by saying so; for he is hibious and unwell. Do, pray, answer this letter immediately.

"Do send Hunt any thing, in prose or verse, of yours, to start him handsomely—any lyrical, irical, or what you please.

Has not your potato committee been blundering? Your advertisement says, that Mr. L. Callaghan (a queer name for a banker) hath been disposing of money in Ireland sans authority of the commonwealth. I have sent out the committee, the chairman of which carries pistol's in his pocket, of course.

When you can spare time from duetting, coquetting with your Hibernians of both sexes, let me have a line from you. I doubt whether Paris is a good place for the composition of your new poem.'

LETTER DLXX.

TO MR. ROOGE.

"Fins, August 5, 1822.

"You will have heard by this time that Shelley and another gentleman (Captain Williams) were drowned about a month ago, (a month yesterday,) in a squall off the Gulf of Spezia. There is thus another man gone, about whom the world was ill-naturedly, and ignorantly, and brutally mistaken. It will, perhaps, do him justice now, when he can be no better for it. You were all mistaken about Shelley, who was, without exception, the best and least selfish man I ever knew.

"I have not seen the thing you mention,* and only heard of it casually, nor have I any desire. The price is, as I saw in some advertisements, fourteen shillings, which is too much for a libel on one's self. Some one said in a letter, that it was a work for Watkins, who deals in the life and libel line. It must have diminished your natural pleas-ure, as a friend, (vide Roche Foncuit,) to see yourself in it.

"With regard to the Blackwood fellows, I never published any thing against them; nor, indeed, have seen their Magazine (except in Galigiani's extracts) for these three years past. I once wrote, a good while ago, some remarks on their review of Don Juan, but saying very little about themselves,—these were not published. If you think that I ought to follow your example* (I am like to be in your company when you) in contradicting their impudence, you may shape this declaration of mine into a similar paragraph for me. It is possible that you may have seen the little I did write (and never published) at Murray's: it contained much more about Southerly than about the Blacks.

"If you think that I ought to do any thing about Watkins' book, I should not care much about publishing my memoir now, should it be necessary to counteract the fellow. But in that case, I should like to look over the press myself. Let me know what you think, or whether I had better not,—at least, not the second part, which touches on the actual confines of still existing matters.

"I have written to Mr. John Murray, of Don Juan, and am hovering on the brink of another, (the ninth.) The reason I want the stanzas again which I sent you is, that as these contain a full detail of the story in cantos, its value to the siege and assault of Ismael with much of sarcasm on these butchers in large business, your mercenary soldiery, it is a good opportunity of grasping the poem with the press. With these stanzas and these fellows, it is necessary, I suppose, for my present style of passion and life, to throw away the scabbard. I know it is against fearful odds; but the battle must be fought; and it will be eventfully for the good of mankind, whatever it may be for the individual who risks himself.

"What do you think of your Irish bishop? Do you remember Swift's line, 'Let me have a barricad—a sig for the clergy.' This seems to have been his reverend's motto.

"Yours, &c.,

LETTER DLXXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Fins, August 7, 1822.

"It is a tiresome trouble with you, to write to each other in such small gear;* but it must be owned that I should be glad if you would inquire whether my Irish subscription ever reached the committee in Paris from Leghorn. My reasons, like Yellum's, are threefold: First, the doubt of the accuracy of all almanacs, or remittals of benevolent cash; second, I do suspect that the said committee having in part served its time to time-serving, may have kept back the acknowledgment of an handsome politician's name in their lists; and, third, I feel pretty sure that I shall one day be twitted by the government scribes for having been a professor of love for Ireland, and not coming forward with the others in her distresses.

"It is not, as you may opine, that I am ambitious of having my name in the papers, as I can have that any day in the week gratis. All I want is, to know if the Reverend Thomas Hall did or did not remit my subscription (two hundred soudi of Tuscany, or about a thousand francs, more or less) to the committee at Paris.

"The other day at Viareggio, I thought proper to swim off to my schooner (the Bolivar) to get the offering, and then to shore again—about three miles, or better, in all. As it was at midday, under a broiling sun, the consequence has been a feverish attack, and my whole skin's coming off, after going through the process of one large continuous blister, raised by the sun and sea together. I have suffered much pain; not being able to lie on my back, or even ride; for my shoulders and arms were equally St. Bartholomewed. But it is over now. I have got a new skin, and am as glossy as a snake in its new suit.

"We have been burning the bodies of Shelley and Williams on the sea-shore, to render them fit for removal and rapid interment. You can have no idea what an extraordinary effect such a funeral pile has, on a desolate shore, with mountains in the background and the sea before, and the singular appearance like the sail and franksine of the dame. All of Shelley was consumed, except his heart, which would not take the flame and is now preserved in spirits of wine.

"Your old acquaintance, Londonderry, has quietly died at North Cray! and the virtuous De Witt was torn in pieces by the populace! What a lucky

In him your Irish Franklin est mort.

"Swearing articles for his new Journal; and both he and I think it somewhat shabbily in you not to contribute. Will you become one of the proprietors? "Do, and we go snack." I really cannot think twice before you respond in the negative.

"I have nearly (quite three) four new cantos Don Juan ready. I obtained permission from the female censor morum of my morals to continue it, provided it were immaculate; so I have been as decent as need be. There is a deal of war—a siege, and all that, in the style, graphical and technical, of the shipwreck in canto second, "which, 'took,' as they say in the Rover. "Yours, &c.

"P.S. That  Galiano has about ten lies in one paragraph. It was not a Bible that was found in Shelley's pocket, but John Keats' poems. However, it would not have been strange, for he was a great admirer of scripture as a composition. I did not send my bust to the academy of New York; but I sat for my picture to young West, an American artist, at the request of some members of that academy to him that he would take my portrait,—for the academy, I believe.

"I had, and still have, thoughts of South America, and am fluctuating between it and Greece. I should have gone, long ago, to one of them, but for my liaison with the Countess O.; for love, in those days, was little compatible with every. Nor would be delighted to go too, but I do not choose to expose her to a long voyage, and a residence in an unsettled country, where I shall probably take a part of some sort."

 LETTER DLXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Genoa, October 9, 1822.

'I have received your letter, and as you explain it, I have no objection, on your account, to omit those passages in the new Mystery, (which were marked in the half-sheet sent the other day to Pisa,) or the passage in Cain,—but why not be open, and say so at first? You should be more straightforward on every account.

'I have been very unwell—four days confined to my bed, in 'the worst inn's worst room,' at Lerici, with a violent rheumatic and bilious attack, constipation, and the devil knows what.—no physician, except a young fellow, who, however, was kind and cautious, and that's enough.

'At last I seized Thomson's book of prescriptions, (a donation of yours,) and physicied myself with the first dose I found in it; and after undergoing the ravages of all kinds of decoctions, salilled from bed on the fifth day to cross the Gulf to Sestri. The sea revived me instantly; and I ate the saltors cold fish, and drank a gallon of country wine, and got to Genoa the same night after landing at Sestri, and have ever since been keeping well, but thinner, and with an occasional cough towards evening.

'I am afraid the Journal is a bad business, and won't do; but in it I am sacrificing myself for others —I can have no advantage in it. I believe the brothers Hunt to be honest men; I am sure that the present moment is a critical one, and you have either to come to an issue, or to see it out, and with the most caution. I believe the brothers Hunt to be honest men; I am sure that the present moment is a critical one, and you have either to come to an issue, or to see it out, and with the most caution.

'You have been a good fellow at bottom, and it is on this presumption that I now write to you on the subject of a poor woman of the name of Fossey, who is, or was, an author of yours, as she says, and published a book on Switzerland, in 1816, patronized by the 'Court and Colonel M'Mahon.' But it seems that neither the Court nor the Colonel could get over the portentous price of three pounds thirteen and sixpence, which alarmed the too susceptible publisher; and in his panic he called the book 'the handbook of what is worse, the poor soul's husband died too, and she writes with the man a corpse before her; but instead of addressing the bishop or Mr. Wilberforce, she has the temerity to that number, i. e. the ecclesiastical, syllogistical, philological person, myself, as they say in Notts. It is strange enough, but the rascaille English, who calumniate me in every direction and on every score, whenever they are in great distress recur to me for assistance. If I have had one example of this, I have had letters from a thousand, and as far as is in my power have tried to repay good for evil, and purchase a shilling's worth of salvation as long as my hand can hold a pen.

'Now, I am willing to do what I can for this unfortunate person; but her situation and her wishes (not unreasonable, however) require more than can be advanced by one individual like myself; for I have many claims of the same kind just at present, and also some remittances of debt to pay in England—God, he knows, the latter how reluctantly! Can the Literary Fund do nothing for her? By your interest, which is almost a name among the literary, I dare say that something might be collected. Can you get any of her books published? Suppose you took her as author in my place, now vacant among your rags—ruffians: she is a moral and pious person, and will anchor upon your shelves. But, seriously, &c.—what you can for her.'

 LETTER DLXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Genoa, June 23, 1823.

'I have to thank you for a parcel of books, which are very welcome, especially Sir Walter's gift of Halidon Hill. You have sent me a copy of 'Werner,' but without the preface. I have published it without, you will have plunged me into a very disagreeable dilemma, because I shall be accused of plagiarism from Miss Lee's German's Tales, whereas I have fully and freely acknowledged that the drama is entirely taken from them, I dare say that something might be collected. Can you get any of her books published? Suppose you took her as author in my place, now vacant among your rags—ruffians: she is a moral and pious person, and will anchor upon your shelves. But, seriously, &c.—what you can for her.'

'I return you the Quarterly Review, uncut and unopened, not from disrespect, or disregard, or pique, but it is a kind of reading which I have some time disposed, as I think, the periodical style of writing hurtful to the habits of the mind by presenting the superficies of too many things at once. I do not know that it contains any thing disagreeable to me—it may or it may not; nor do I return it on account that there may be an article which you hinted at in one of your late letters, but because I have left off reading these kind of works, and should equally have returned you any other number.

I am obliged to take in one or two abroad, because solicited to do so. The Edinburgh came before me by mere chance in Galignani's picturesque sort of gazette, where he had inserted a part of it.

You will have received various letters from me lately, in a style which I used with relucence; but you left me no other choice by your absolute refusal to communicate with a man you did not like upon the mere simple matter of transfer of a few papers of little consequence, (except to their author,) and which could be of no possible advantage to yourself.

"I hope that Mr. Kinnaird is better. It is strange that you never alluded to his accident, if it be true, as stated in the papers."

"I am yours, &c., &c."

"I hope that you have a milder winter than we have had here. We have had inundations worthy of the Trent or Po, and the conductor (Franklin's) of my house was struck (or supposed to be stricken) by a thunderbolt. It was not near the window that I was dazzled, and my eyes hurt for several minutes, and every body in the house felt an electric shock at the moment. Madame Guiccioli was frightened, as you may suppose.

"I have thought since that your biggest would have 'saddled me with a judgment,' (as Thackwun did Square when he bit his tongue in talking metaphysics,) if any thing had happened of consequence. These follows always forget themselves in their Christianity, and what he said when 'the tower of Siloam fell.'"

"To-day is the 9th, and the 10th is my surviving daughter's birthday. I have ordered, as a rule, a mutton chop and a bottle of ale. She is seven years old, I believe. Did I ever tell you that the day I came of age I dined on eggs and bacon and a bottle of ale? For once in a way they are my favorite dishes and drinks, but as I suppose them agnostic with me, I never use them but on great jubilees—once in four or five years or so.

"I see somebody represents the Hunts and Mrs. Shelley as living in my house; they reside at some distance, and I do not see them twice in a month. I have not met Mr. Hunt a dozen times since I came to Genoa, or near it."

"Yours ever, &c."

LETTER DLXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

[Genoa, March 26th, 1823.]

"I had sent you back the Quarterly without perusal, having resolved to read no more reviews, good, bad, or indifferent; but 'who can control his fate?'

Galignani, to whom my English studies are confined, has forwarded a copy of at least one-half of it in his indefatigable catch-penny weekly compilation; and, as 'like honor, it came unlooked for,' I have looked through it. I must say that, upon the whole, that is, the whole of the half which I have read, (for the other half is to be the segment of Galignani's next week's circular,) it is extremely handson, and anything but unkind or unfair. As I take the good in good part, I must not, will not quarrel with the bad. What the writers say of Don Juan is harsh, but it is inevitable. He must fall, as long as they are not in the opinion of a prevailing and yet not very firmly seated party. A review may and will direct and 'turn awry' the currents of opinion, but it must not directly oppose them. Don Juan will be known, by and by, for what it is intended, a Satire on abuses of the present state of society, and not an eulogy of vice. It may be now and then vulpineous:—I can't help that. Ariosto is worse; Smollett (see Lord Stratf well in vol. ii. of Roderick Random) ten times worse; and Fielding no better. No girl will ever be so sensible as reading Don Juan."

"I hope that the Hunters prospered, would not in all probability have continued. As it is, I will not quit them in their adversity, though it should cost me character, fame, and the usual et cetera."

"My original motives I already explained, (in the letter which you thought proper to show:) they are the true ones, and I abide by them, as I tell you, and I told Leigh Hunt when he questioned me on the subject. These were my sentiments, and I confess I don't see any thing in the letter to hurt him, unless I said he was 'a bore,' which I don't remember. Had their Journal gone on well, and I could have aided to make it better for them, I should then have left them, after my avowal of approval of their general purpose, to make a prosperous voyage by themselves. As it is, I can't, and would not if I could, leave them among the breakers."

"As to any community of feeling, thought, or opinion between Leigh Hunt and me, there is little or none. We meet rarely, hardly ever; but I think him a good-principled and able man, and must do as I would be done by. I do not know what was, he has lived in, but I have lived in three or four, but none like him like his Keats and kangaroo incognita. Alas! poor Shelley! how we would have laughed had he lived, and how we used to laugh now and then at various things which are grave in the suburbs!"

"You are all mistaken about Shelley. You do not know how mild, how tolerant, how good he was in society; and as perfect a gentleman as ever crossed a drawing-room, when he liked, and where liked.

"I have some thoughts of taking a run down to Naples (solus, or, at most, cum solo) this spring, and writing, when I have studied the country, a fifth volume of Contes of Childes Harz, if this is merely an idea for the present, and I have other excursions and voyages in my mind. The busts are finished: are you worthy of them?"

"Yours, &c."

N. B.

"P. S. Mrs. Shelley is residing with the Hunts at some distance from me. I see them very seldom, and generally on account of their business. Mrs. Shelley, if I mistake, will go to England in the spring.

"Count Gambia's family, the father and mother and daughter, are residing with me by Mr. Hill (the minister's) recommendation, as a safer asylum from the political persecutions, than they could have in another residence; but they occupy one part of a large house, and I the other, and our establishments are quite separate.

"Among, Nov. 10, 1892.

... The Chevalier persisted in declaring himself an old, used gentleman, and describing you as a gentlewoman, of a manly disposition without giving them any sort of compensation, containing yourself, it seems, under the same fool instead of two, which is the no more approved method of proceeding on such occasions. For my part, I think you are quite right; and be assured from me that a woman (as society is constituted in England), who gives any advantage to a man may expect a lover, but will sooner or later find a tyrant; and this is not the man's fault either, perhaps, but is the necessary and natural result of the circumstances of society which, in fact, tyrannize over the man equally with the woman that is to say, if either of them have any feeling or honor.

You can write to me at your leisure and inclination. I have always laid it down as a maxim, and found it justified by experience, that a man and a woman make far better friendships than can exist between two of the same sex; but these with this condition, that they never have made, or are to make, love with each other. Lovers may, and, indeed, generally are enemies, but they never can be friends; because there must always be a spice of jealousy and a something of self in all their speculations.

... Indeed, I rather look upon love altogether as a sort of hostile transaction, very necessary to make or to break matches, and keep the world going, but by no means a sinecure to the parties concerned.

... Now, as my love-privileges are, I believe, pretty well over, and yours, by all accounts, are never to begin, we shall be the best friends imaginable as far as both are concerned, and with this advantage, that we may both fall to loving right and left through all our acquaintance, without either sullenness or sorrow from that amiable passion which are inseparable attendants.

... Had I been aware of your tragedy when I wrote my note to Maricho Faliero, although it is a matter of no consequence to you, I should certainly not have omitted to insert your name with those of the other writers who still do honor to the drama. My own notions on the subject altogether different from the popular ideas of the day, that we differ essentially, as indeed do I from our whole English literati upon that topic. But I do not contend that I am right—I merely say that such is my opinion, and as it is a solitary one, it can do no great harm. But it does not prevent me from doing justice to the powers of those who adopt a different view."

LETTER DLXVII.

TO MR. MOORE

"Groes, Feb. 29, 1893.

... My Dear Tom,

I must again refer you to those two letters addressed to you at Passy before I read your speech in Galigam, &c., and which you do not seem to have received.

Of Hunt I see little—once a month or so, and then on his own business, generally. You may easily suppose that I know too little of Hampstead and his satellites to have much communion or community with him. My whole present relation to him arose from Shelley's unexpected wretched. You would not have had me leave him in the street with his family, would you? and as to the other plan you mention, you forget how it would humiliate him— that his writings should be supposed to be dead weight! Think a moment—he is perhaps the vainest man on earth, at least his own friends say so pretty loudly; and if he were in other circumstances, might have been tempted to take him down a peg; but not now, it would be cruel. It is a cursed business; but neither the motive nor the means rest upon my conscience, and it happens that he and his brother have been so far benefitted by the publication in a pecuniary point of view. His brother is a steady, bold fellow, such as Pryme, for example, and full of moral, and, I hear, physical courage.

... And you are really recanting, or softening to the clergy! It will do little good for you—it is you not the poem, they are at. They will say they brightened you— forbid it, Ireland!"

"Yours ever,

"N. B."

LETTER DLXVIII.

TO MRS.

... I presume that you, at least, know enough of me to be sure that I could have no intention to insult Hunt's poverty. On the contrary, I honor him for it; for I know what it is, having been as much embarrassed as ever he was, without perceiving aught in it to diminish an honorable man's self-respect. If you mean to say that, had he been a wealthy man, I would have joined in this Journal, I answer in the negative. I engaged in the Journal from good-will towards him, added to respect for his character, literary and personal; and so less for his political courage, as well as regret for his present circumstances: I did this in the hope that he might, with the same aid from literary friends of literary contributions, (which is requisite for all journals of a mixed nature,) render himself independent."

... I have always treated him, in our personal intercourse, with the utmost respect, that I have borne intruding advice, which I thought might be disagreeable, lest he should impute it to what is called 'taking advantage of a man's situation.'

... As to friendship, it is a propensity in which my genius is very limited. I do not know the made human being, except Lord Clare, the friend of my infancy, for whom I feel any thing that deserves the name. All my others are men-of-the-world friendships. I did nothing so delightful as to be much I admired and esteemed him; so that you see not even vanity could bribe me into it, for, of all men, Shelley thought highest of my talents—and, perhaps of my disposition.

... I will do my duty by my intimates, upon the principle of doing as you would be done by. I have done so, I trust, in most instances. I may be pleased with their conversation— rejoice in their success—he glad to them a service, or to receive their counsel and assistance in return. But, as for friends and friendship, I have (as I already said) named the only remaining male for whom I feel any thing of the kind, excepting perhaps Byron and Moore. I have had, and may have still, a thousand friends, as they are called, in life, who are like one’s partners in the walk of this world, not much remembered when the ball is over, though very pleasant for the time. Habit, business, and companionship in pleasure or in pain, are links of a similar kind, and the same faith in politics is another LETTER DLXXIX.

TO LADY * * *

"Genoa, March 29, 1813.

"Mr. Hill is here: I dined with him on Saturday before last, upon leaving his house at S. F. d’Arenca, my carriage broke down. I walked home, about three miles,—no very great feat of pedestrianism; but either the coming out of hot rooms into a bleak wind chilled me, or the walking up-hill of Albisano heated me, or something or other set me wrong, and next day I had an inflammatory attack in the face, to which I have been subject this winter, but I suffered a good deal of pain, but no peril. My health is now much as usual. Mr. Hill is, I believe, occupied with his diplomacy. I shall give him your message when I see him again."

"My name, I see in the papers, has been dragged into the unhappy Portsmouth business, of which all that I know is very succinct. Mr. Hanson is my solicitor. I found him so when I was ten years old—at my uncle’s death—and he was continued in the management of my legal business. He asked me, by a civil epistle, as an old acquaintance of his family, to be present at the marriage of Miss Hanson. I went very reluctantly, one misty morning (for I had been up at two balls all night), to witness the ceremony, which I could not very well refuse without affronting a man who had never offended me. I saw nothing particular in the marriage. Of course I could not know the preliminaries, except from second-hand, not having been present at the wooing, nor after it, for I walked home, and they went into the country as soon as they had promised and vowed. Out of this simple fact I hear the Debats de Paris has quoted Miss H. as ‘autrefois titre le vie avec le cheval,’ &c., &c. I am obliged to him for the celebrity, but beg leave to decline the daisons, which is quite untrue; my liaison was with the father, in the unsentimental shape of long lawyers’ bills, through the medium of which I have had to pay him ten or twelve thousand pounds within these few years. She was not pretty, and I suspect that the indefatigable Mr. A— (was like all her people) more attracted by her title than her charm. I regret very much that I was present at the prologue to the happy state of horsewhipping and black jobs, &c., &c., but I could not foresee that a man was to turn out mad, who had gone about the world for fifty years, as competent to vote, and walk at large; nor did he seem to me more insane than any other person going to be married.

"I have no objection to be acquainted with the Marquis Palavicini, if he likes me. Lately, I have gone little into society, English or foreign, for I had seen all that was worth seeing in the former before I left England, and at the time of life when I was more disposed to like it; and of the latter I had a sufficiency in the first few years of my residence in Switzerland, chiefly at Madame de Stael’s, where I went sometimes, till I grew tired of conversation! and carnivals, with their appendages; and the born is, that if you go once, you are continually at it, daily, and in the night. Therefore I went the round of the most noted sources at Venice or elsewhere (where I remained not any time) to the Benzonas, and the Albrizzi, and the Michelles, &c., &c., and to the cardinals and the various cabinets of the Legation, in Romagna (that is Ravenna), and only receded for the sake of quiet when I came into Tuscany. Besides, if I go into society, I generally get, in the long run, some scamps of some kind or other, which don’t occur in my solitudes. However, I am pretty well settled now, by time and temper, which is so far lucky as it prevents restlessness; but, as I said before, as an acquaintance of yours, I will be ready and willing to know your friends. He may be a sort of connexion for aught I know; for a Palavici, of Bolognens, believe, married a distant relative of mine half a century ago. I happen to know the fact, as he and his spouse had an annuity of five hundred pounds on my uncle’s property, which ceased at his demise, though I recollect hearing they attempted, naturally enough, to make it survive him. If I can do any thing for you here, or elsewhere, pray order, and be obeyed.

LETTER DLXXX.

TO MR. MOORE

"Genoa, April 6, 1813.

"I have just seen some friends of yours, who paid me a visit yesterday, which, in honor of them and of you, I returned to-day;—as I reserve my bear-skin and teeth, and paws and claws, for our enemies.

"I have also seen Henry Fox, Lord Holland’s son, whom I had not looked upon since I left him a pretty mild boy without a neckcloth, in a jacket, and in delicate health, seven long years ago, at the period of mine eclipse—the third. I believe, as I have generally one every two or three years. I think that he has the softest and most amiable expression of countenance I ever saw, and manners too. If to those he can add hereditary talents, he will keep the name of Fox in all its freshness for half a century more. I hope. I speak from a transient glimpse—but I love still to yield to such impressions; for I have ever found that those I liked best and best, I took to at first sight; and I always liked that boy; perhaps, in part, from some resemblance in the less fortunate part of our destinies; I mean, to avoid mistakes of his kind. But there is this difference, that he appears a halting angel, who has tripped against a star: while I am Le Diable Boiteux,—a souririkut, which I marvel that, among their various nominus unusquisque, the Orthodox have not hit upon, an annuity of five hundred pounds on my uncle’s property, which ceased at his demise, though I recollect hearing they attempted, naturally enough, to make it survive him. If I can do any thing for you here, or elsewhere, pray order, and be obeyed.

* The bent of Portsmouth married Miss Hanson. Attempts were made this time to the English courts to prove him insane.
and chemicals, and speeches in our house—1 mean, of peers! I must refer you to Pope—whom you don’t read, and won’t appreciate—for that quotation, which you must allow to be poetical), and sitting to Stroeling, the painter (do you remember our dinner with him?) I was depicted as one of the ‘heroes of Agincourt,’ with his long sword, saddle, bridle, whack fal de, &c., &c.

I have been unwell—a caught a cold and inflammation which I do not expect a cure of, after dining with our ambassador, Monsieur Hill, not owing to the dinner, but my carriage broke down on the way home, and I had to walk some miles up hill partly, after hot rooms, in a very bleak windy evening, and over-hotted, or over-cooled myself. I have not been so robustious as formerly, ever since the last summer, when I fell ill after a long swim in the Mediterranean, and have never been quite right up to this present writing. I am thin,—perhaps thinner than you saw me, when I was nearly transparent, in 1812,—and am obliged to be moderate of my mouth, which nevertheless, won’t prevent me (the gods willing) from dining with you as we used to do in Italy, (which is not for me, by the by, anyway.) They give me a very good account of you, and of your nearly Empirised Angels. But why did you change your title?—you will regret this some day. The bigots are not to be conciliated; and if they were, are they worth it? I suspect that I am a more orthodox Christian than you are; and, whenever I see a real Christian, either in practice or in theory, (for I never yet found the man who could produce either, when put to the proof,) I am his disciple. But, till then, I cannot truble to tithe mongers, nor can I imagine what has made you circaume your Seraphs.

LETTER DLXXXI.

TO THE EARL OF BLESSINGTON.

"April 9, 1823.

"My Dear Lord,

"How is your goot? or rather, how are you? I return the Count ’s * Journal, which is a very extraordinary production,* and of a most melancholy truth in all that regards high life in England. I know, or know, personally most of the persons and societies, which he describes; and after reading his remarks have the sensation fresh upon me as I had seen them yesterday. I would, however, plead in behalf of some few exceptions, in which I will not mention by-name. The most singular thing is, how he should have penetrated not the fact, but the mystery of the English ennui at two-and-twenty. I was about the same age when I made the same discovery, in almost precisely the same circles—for there is scarcely a person mentioned whom I did not see nightly or daily, and was acquainted more or less intimately with most of them—but I never could have described it so well. It has the francess to eff of this.

"But he ought also to have been in the country during the hunting season, with a select party of distinguished guests, as the papers term it. He ought to have been at least in company, if not on the hunting days, and the scone ensuing thereupon—end the women looking as if they had hunted, or rather been hunted; and I could have wished that he had been in a dinner in town, which I recollect at Longford Hall, but select, and composed of the most amusing people. The dessert was hardly on the table, when, out of twelve I counted two asleep; of that, there were Tierney, Lord * &--; I forgive the other two, but they were either wits or orators—perhaps poets.

"My residence in the East and in Italy has made me somewhat indulgent of the siesta—but then they set regularly about it in warm countries, and perform it in six acts (or at most dinner, ete. with a proper companion,) and retire quietly to their rooms to get out of the sun’s way for an hour or two.

"Altogether, your friend’s * Journal is a very formidable production. Alas! our dearly-beloved countrymen have only discovered that they are tired, and not that they are tiresome; and I suspect that the communication of the latter unpleasant verity will not be better received than truth usually are. I have read the whole with great attention and instruction. I am too good a patriot to see pleasure—at least I won’t say so, whatever I may think. I showed it (I hope no breach of confidence,) to a young Italian lady of rank trio insorute also; and who passes, or passed, for being one of the three most celebrated belles in the district of Italy, where her families and connections resided in less troublesome times as to politics, than her own (which is now governed by these.) Without, I am sure, I have lighted with it, and says that she has derived a better notion of English society from it than from all Madame de Staël’s metaphysical disputations on the same subject, in her work on the Revolution. I beg that you will thank the young poet and philosopher, and make my compliments to Lady B. and her sister

"Believe me your very obliged and faithful friend,

"N. B.

"P. S. There is a rumor in letters of some disturbance or complot in the French Pyrenean army—generals suspected or dismissed, and ministers of war travelling to see what’s the matter. ‘Marry, (as David says,) this hath an angry favor.

"Tell Count * * that some of the names are not quite intelligible, especially of the clubs; he speaks of Watts—perhaps he is right, but in my time Watters was the Dandy Club, of (though no dandy) I was a member, at the time too of its greatest glory, when Brummell and Mildmay, Avanley and Pierrepont, gave the dandy balls; and we (the club, that is,) got up the amus masquerade at Burlington House and Garden for Wellington. He does not speak of the Alfred, which was the most recherché and most tiresome of any, as I know by being a member of that too."

LETTER DLXXXII.

TO THE EARL OF BLESSINGTON.

"April 9, 1823.

"It would be worse than idle, knowing as I do, the utter worthlessness of words on such occasions, in me to attempt to express what I ought to feel and do for the loss you have sustained;* and I must thus dismiss the subject, for I dare not trust myself to it self for your sake, and for my own. I shall endeavor to see you as soon as it may not appear intrusive. Pray excuse the levity of my last day’s serial—I little thought under what circumstances it would find you.

"I have received a very handsome and flattering note from Count. He must excuse my apparent rudeness and real ignorance in replying to it in English, through the medium of your kind intervention. I have not on any account deprived him of a production, of which I really think too much. I have even said, though you are good enough not to be dissatisfied even with that; but whenever it is completed, it would give me the greatest pleasure to have a copy—but how to keep it secret literary secrets are like others. By changing the names, or at least omitting several, and altering the circumstances indicative of the writer's real station, the author would render it a most amusing publication. His countrymen have not been treated either in a literary or personal point of view with such deference in English recent works, as to lay him under any very great national obligation of forbearance; and really the remarks are so true and so poignant that I cannot bring myself to wish their suppression; though, as Dangle says, ‗He is my friend,' many of these personages were my friends, but much such friends as Dangle and his allies.

I return you Dr. Parr's letter—I have met him at Payne Knight's and elsewhere, and he did me the honor once to be a patron of mine, although a great friend of the other branch of the House of Atreus, and the Greek writer (I believe) of my moral, Clytemnestra,—I say moral, because it is true, and so useful to the virtuous, that it enables them to do any thing without the aid of an Argus.

I beg my compliments to Lady B., Miss P., and to your Alfred. I think, since his Majesty of the same name, there has not been such a learned surveyor of our Saxon society.

"Every yours most truly,"

LETTER DLXXXIII.

TO THE EARL OF BLESSINGTON.

"April 14, 1822.

"I am truly sorry that I cannot accompany you in your ride this morning, owing to a violent pain in my face, arising from a wart to which I by medical advice applied a caustic. Whether I put too much, I do not know, but the consequence is, not only I have been put to some pain but the peccant part and its immediate environ are as black as if the printer's devil had marked me for an author. As I do not wish to frighten your horses, or your riders, I shall postpone waiting upon you until six o'clock. I hope to have embarked into a medley of Christianlike resemblance to my fellow-creatures. My infatuation has partially extended even to my fingers for on trying to get the black from off my upper lip at least, I have only transfigured a portion thereof as marked in my letter en-j- noir eau de cologne, nor any other eau, have been able as yet to redeem it also from a more inky appearance than is either proper or pleasant. But the worst of all—you may have perceived something of the kind yesterday, for on my return, I saw that during my visit it had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished; and I could not help laughing at the figure I must have cut before you. At any rate, I shall be with you at six o'clock with the advantage of twilight.

"Ever most truly, &c."

LETTTER DLXXXIV.

TO THE COUNT * * *

"April 20, 1822.

"My dear Count * * *, (if you will permit me to address you so familiarly,) you should be content with writing in your own language, like Grammont, and succeeding in London as nobody has succeeded since the days of Charles the Second and the rococo painter Antonio Hamilton, without deviating into our barbarous language,—which you understand and write, however much better than it deserves.

"My approbation,' as you are pleased to term it, was very sincere, but perhaps not very impartial; for though I love my country, I do not love my countrymen, at least, such as they now are. And besides the seduction of talent and wit in your work, I fear that to the Englishman there was the attraction of verisimilitude. I have seen and felt much of what you have described so well. I have known the persons, and the reunions so described—(many of them that is to say)—and the portraits are so like that I cannot but admire the painter no less than his performance.

"But I am sorry for you; for if you are so well acquainted with life at your age, what will become of you when the illusion is still more deluding but never mind—en avant!—live while you can; and that you may have the full enjoyment of the many advantages of youth, talent, and figure, which you possess, is the wish of an Englishman. I suppose,—but it is no treason; for my mother was Scotch, and my name and my family are both Norman: and as for myself, I am of no country. As for my 'Works,' which you are pleased to mention, let them go to the devil, from whence (if you believe many persons) they came.

"I have the honor to be your obliged, &c., &c."

TO THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

"Dear Lady * *,

"My request would be for a copy of the miniature of Lady B., which I have seen in possession of the late Lady Noel, as I have no picture, or indeed memorial of any kind of Lady B., as all her letters were in her own possession before I left England, and we have had no correspondence since—at least on her part.

LETTERS.

LETTER DLXXXVI.

TO THE COUNTESS OP * * *.

"May 8, 1823.

I send you the letter which I had forgotten, and the book, which I ought to have remembered. It contains (the book, I mean) some melancholy truths; though I believe that it is too trite a work ever to have been popular. The first time I ever read it, (not the edition you send me, for I got it since,) was at the desire of Madame de Staël, who was supposed by the good-natured world to be the heroine;—which she was not, however, and was furious at the supposition. This occurred in Switzerland, in the summer of 1816, and the last season in which I ever saw that celebrated person.

I have a request to make to my friend Alfred, (since he has not disdained the title,) viz., that he would send me, in the course of the letter, which I leave you (for I got it since,) a cap to the gentleman in the jacket,—it would complete his costume,—and smooth his brow, which is somewhat too involuntary a likeness of the original, God help me!

I did well to avoid the water-party,—only, is a mystery, which it would be desirable to be understood by all the other mysteries. Tell Milor that I am deep in his MSS., and will do him justice by a diligent perusal.

The letter which I enclose was prevented from sending, by the desirous of its doing any good. I was perfectly sincere when I wrote it, and am so still. But it is difficult for me to withstand the thousand provocations on that subject, which both friends and foes have not been slow in throwing in the way of a man whose feelings were once quick, and whose temper was never patient. But returning were as tedious as go o'er. I feel this as much as ever Macbeth did; and it is a dreary sensation, which at least avenges the real or imaginary wrongs of one of the two unfortunate persons whom it concerns.

But I am going to be gloomy—so to bed, or bed. Good night,—or rather morning. One of the reasons why I wish to avoid society is, that I can never sleep after it, and the pleasantness it has been, the less I rest.

Ever most truly, &c., &c."

LETTER DLXXXIX.

TO MR. BOWRING.

Genoa, May 12, 1815.

Sir,

I have great pleasure in acknowledging your letter, and the honor which the committee have done me; I shall endeavor to deserve their confidence by every means in my power. My first wish is to go up into the Levant in person, where I might be enabled to advance, if not the cause, at least the means of obtaining information which the committee might be desirous of acting upon; and my former residence in the country, my familiarity with its language, (I hear by letters that there universally spoken, or at least to the same extent as French in the more polished parts of the continent,) and my not total ignorance of the Remaick would afford me some advantage in that respect. To this project the only objection is a domestic nature, and I shall try to get over it—if I fail in this, I must do what I can where I am; but it will be always a source of regret to me, to think that I might perhaps have done more for the cause on the spot.

Our last information of Captain Blaquiere is from Ancona, where he embarked with a fair wind for Corfu, on the 15th ult.; he is now probably at his destination. My last letter from him personally was dated Rome; he had been refused a passport through the Neapolitan territory, and returned to strike up through Romagna for Ancona; little time, however, appears to have been lost by the delay.

The principal material wanted by the Greeks appears to be, first, a park of field artillery—light, and fit for mountain-service; secondly, gunpowder, thirdly, hospital or medical stores. The readiness of my own residence at Ancona, close to Rome, and addressed to Mr. Negri, the minister, I meant to send up a certain quantity of the latter—no great deal—but enough for an individual to show his good wishes for the Greek success; if it is passing, because, in case I should go myself, I can take them with me. I do not want to limit my own contribution to this merely, but more especially, if I can get to Greece myself, I should devote whatever resources I can muster of my own, to advancing the great object. I am in correspondence with Signor Nicolas Karrellas, (well known to Mr. Hobhouse,) who is now at Pisa; but his latest advice merely stated, that the Greeks are at present employed in organizing their internal government, and the details of its administration; this would seem to indicate security, but the war is however far from being terminated.

The Turks are an obstinate race, as all former wars have proved them, and will return to the charge for years to come, even if beaten, as it is to be hoped they will be. But in no case can the labors of the committee be said to be in vain, for in the event even of the Greeks being subdued and dispersed, the funds which could be employed in succoring and gathering together the remnant, so as to alleviate in part their distresses, and enable them to find out and receive (like a countryman) so many emigrants of other nations have been compelled to do,) would bless both those who gave and those who took, as the bounty both of justice and of mercy.

I shall write to the formation of a brigade, (which Mr. Hobhouse hinted at in his letter of this day's receipt, enclosing the one to which I gave the honor to reply,) I would presume to sug-

"P.S. The best retribution of Gell will be the active exertions of the Committee;—I am too warm a controversialist; and I suspect that if Mr. Hobhouse has had the chance in hand, there will be little occasion for me to 'encumber him with help.' If I go up into the country, I will endeavor to transmit as accurate and impartial an account as circumstances will permit."

"I shall write to Mr. Karrellas. I expect intelligence from Captain Blaquiere, who has promised me some early intimation from the seat of the Provisional Government. I gave him a letter of introduction to Lord Sidney Osborne, to Corinth, as Lord S. is in the government service, of course his reception could only be a cautious one."
LETTER DXC.

TO MR. BOWING.

"Genoa, May 21, 1823.

"Sir,

"I received yesterday the letter of the Committee, dated the 14th of March. What has occasioned the delay, I know not. It was forwarded by Mr. Gaiggiani, from Paris, who stated that he had only had it in his charge for a moment, as it was delivered to him by Mr. Grattan. I need hardly say that I gladly accede to the proposition of the Committee, and hold myself highly honored by being deemed worthy to be a member. I have also to return my thanks, particularly to yourself, for the accompanying letter, which is extremely flattering.

"Since I last wrote to you, through the medium of Mr. Hobhouse, I have received and forwarded a letter from Captain Blaquiere to me, from Corfu, which will show how he gets on. Yesterday I fell in with two young Germans, survivors of General Normann's band. They arrived in Genoa in a most deplorable state—without food—without a sou—without clothes. They came to publish their story on their territory on their landing at Trieste: and they had been forced to come down to Florence, and had travelled from Leghorn here, with four Tuscan levies (about three francs) in their pockets. I have nothing to say of Genoese scudi, (about a hundred and thirty-three livres, French money,) and new shoes, which will enable them to get to Switzerland, where they say that they have friends. All that they could raise in Genoa, besides, was thirty sous. They do not complain of the Greeks, but say that they have suffered more since their landing in Italy.

"I tried their veracity, firstly, by their passports and pass-books; secondly, by a topography, cross-questioning them about Arta, Argos, Athens, Missolonghi, Corinth, &c.; and, thirdly, in Romanio, of which I found (one of them at least) knew more than I do. One of them (they are both of good families) is a fine, handsome young fellow of three-and-twenty—a Wirtemberger, and has a look of SCOUT about him—the other a Bavarian, older, and flat-faced, and less ideal, but a great, sturdy, soldier-like personage. The Wirtemberger was in the action at Arta, where the Philhellenes were cut to pieces after killing six hundred Turks, they themselves being only a hundred and fifty in number, opposed to six or seven thousand; only eight escaped, and of them about three only survived; so that General Normann posted his raggamuffins where they were well peppered—not three of the hundred and fifty left alive—and they are for the towns and cities now.

"These two left Greece by the direction of the Greeks. When Chushrid Pacha overran the Morea, the Greeks seem to have behaved well, in wishing to save their allies, when they thought that the game was up with themselves. This was in September last, (1822;) they wandered from island to island, and got from Milo to Smyrna, where the French consul gave them a passport, and a charitable voyage to Ancona, where they got to Trieste, and were turned back by the Austrians. They complain only of the minister, (who has always been an indifferent character;) say that the Greeks fight well in their own way, but were at first afraid to fire their own cannon—but mended with practice.

"Adolphe (the younger) commanded at Navarino for a short time; the other, a more material person, "the bold Bavarian in a luckless hour," seems chary to lament a fast of three days at Argos, and the loss of twenty-five paras a day of pay in arrear, and some baggage at Tripolitza; but takes his wounds, and marches, and battles with good humor. Both are very simple, full of naives, and quite unpretending: they say the foreigners quarrelled among themselves, particularly the French with the Germans, which produced duels.

"The Greeks accept muskets, but throw away bayonets, and will not be disciplined. When these lads saw two Piedmontese regiments yesterday they said, 'Ah, if we had had but these two, we should have cleared the Morea.' In that case the Piedmontese must have behaved better than they did against the Austrians. They seem to lay great stress upon a few regular troops—say that the Greeks have arms and powder in plenty, but want victuals, hospital stores, and lint and linen, &c., and money very much. Altogether, it would be difficult to show more practical philosophy than this remnant of our 'purit hill folk' have done; they do not seem the least cast down, and their mode of presenting themselves was as simple, and natural as could be. They said, a Dane here had told them that an Englishman, friendly to the Greek cause, was here, and that, as they were reduced to beg their way home, they thought they might as well begin with me. I write in haste to snatch the post.—Believe me, and truly,

"Your obliged, &c.

"P. S. I have, since I wrote this, seen them again. Count P. Gamba asked them to breakfast. One of them must publish his Journal of the campaign. The Bavarian wonders a little that the Greeks are not quite the same with them of the time of Themistocles, (they were not then very irascible, by-the-bye), and at the difficulty of disciplining them—he is a soldier and tactician, and a little like Dugald Dalgety, who would insist upon the erection of a scionce on the hill of Drumsnab, or whatever it was; the other seems to wonder at nothing."

LETTER DXCI.

TO MR. CHURCH, AMERICAN CONSUL AT GENOA.

"Genoa, May 18, 1823.

"The accounts are so contradictory, as to what mode will be best for supplying the Greeks, that I have deemed it better to take up, (with the exception of a few supplies,) what cash and credit I can muster, rather than lay them out in articles that might be deemed superfluous or unnecessary. Here we can learn nothing but from some of the refugees, who appear chiefly interested for themselves. My accounts from an agent of the Committee, an English gentleman lately come up to Greece, are hitherto favorable, but he had not yet reached the seat of the Provisional Government, and I am anxiously expecting further advice.

"An American has a better right than any other, to suggest to other nations the mode of obtaining that liberty which is the glory of his own."

LETTER DXCII.

TO M. H. BEYLE.

Rue de Richelieu, Paris.

"Genoa, May 28, 1823.

"Sir,

"At present, that I know to whom I am indebted for a flattering mention in the 'Home, Naples, and Florence,' in 1817, by Mons. Stendhal, it is fit that I should return my thanks (however undesired or undesirable) to Mons. Beyle, with whom I had the honor of being acquainted at Milan in 1816. You only did me much honor in what you pleased to say in that work; but it hardly given me less pleasure than the praise itself, to have hurt myself without doing much good to those for whose benefit it was intended.

"Do not defend me—it will never do—you will only make yourself enemies."

"Mine are neither to be diminished nor softened but they may be overthrown; and there are events which may occur less improbable than those which have happened in our time, that may reverse the present state of things—nous verrons."

"I send you this gossip that you may laugh at it, which is all it is good for, if it is even good for so much. I shall be delighted to see you again; but it will be melancholy, should it be only for a moment."

"Ever yours,

"N. B."

LETTER DXCIV.

TO THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

"My Dear Lady B. & C.,"

"I am superstitious, and have collected that memorials with a point are of less fortunate augury: I will, therefore request you to accept, instead of the pin, the enclosed chain, which is of so slight a value that you need not hesitate. As you wished for something worn, I can only say, that it has been worn oftener and longer than the other. It is of Venetian manufacture; and the only peculiarity about it is, that it could only be obtained at, or from, Venice. At Genoa they have none of the same kind. I also enclose a ring, which I would wish Alfred to keep; it is too large to wear; but is formed of lace, and so far adapted to the fire of his years and character. You will perhaps have the goodness to acknowledge the receipt of this note, and send back the pin, (for good luck's sake,) which I shall value much more for having been a night in your custody."

"Ever and faithfully your obliged, &c.

"P. S. I hope your nerves are well to-day, and will continue to flourish."

LETTER DXCV.

TO MR. BOWRING.

"July 7, 1829.

"We sail on the 12th for Greece—I have had a letter from Mr. Biaquiere, too long for present transcription, but very satisfactory. The Greek government expects me without delay."

"In conformity to the desires of Mr. B. and other correspondents in Greece, I have to suggest, with all deference to the committee, that a remittance of ten thousand pounds only (Mr. B.'s expression) would be of the greatest service to the Greek Government at present. I have also to recommend strongly the attempt of a loan, for which there will be offered a sufficient security by deputies now on their way to England. In the mean time, I hope that the committee will be enabled to do something effectual.

"For my own part, I mean to carry up, in cash or credits, above eight, and nearly nine thousand pounds sterling, which I am enabled to do by funds I have in Italy, and credits in England. Of this sum I must necessarily reserve a portion for the subsistence of myself and suite; the rest I am willing to apply in the manner which seems most likely to be useful to the cause—having, of course, some

LETTER DXCVI.

TO GOETHE.

ILLUSTRIOS SIR,

"Leipzig, July 24, 1823.

I cannot thank you as you ought to be thanked for the lines which my young friend, Mr. Sterling, sent me of yours; and it would but ill become me to pretend to exchange verses with him who, for fifty years, has been the undisputed sovereign of European literature. You must therefore accept my most sincere acknowledgements in prose—and in hasty prose too; for I am at present on my voyage to Greece once more, and surrounded by hurry and bustle, which hardly allow a moment even to gratitude and admiration to express themselves. I am, moreover, some distance from home, and was driven back by a gale of wind, and have since sailed again and arrived here, 'Leghorn,' this morning, to receive on board some Greek passengers for their straggling country. "I have also I found your lines and Mr. Sterling's letter, and I could not have had a more favorable omen, a more agreeable surprise, than a word of Goethe written by his own hand. "I am returning to Greece, to see if I can be of any little use there: if ever I come back, I will pay a visit to Weimar, to offer the sincere homage of one of the many millions of your admirers.

have the honor to be, ever and most,

"Your obliged,

NOTES TO THE COUNTRESS OGGICOLI.

"October 7. "Pietro has told you all the gossip of the island, earthquakes, our politics, and present abode in a pretty village. As his opinions and mine on the Greeks are nearly similar, I need say little on that subject. I was a fool to come here; but, being here, I must see what is to be done." "October — "We are still in Cephalonia, waiting for news of more accurate description; for all is contradiction and division in the reports of the state of the Greeks. I shall fulfill the object of my mission, and return into Italy. For it does not seem likely that, as an individual, I can be of use to them—at least no other foreigner has yet appeared to be so, nor does it seem likely that any will be at present allowed to act as emissaries.

"Pray be as cheerful and tranquil as you can; and be assured that there is nothing here that can excite any thing but a wish to be with you again,—though we are very kindly treated by the English here of all descriptions. Of the Greeks, I can't say much good hitherto, and I do not like to speak ill of them, though they do one another." "October 29. "You may be sure that the moment I can join you again will be as welcome to me as at any period of our recollection. There is nothing very attractive here to divide my attention; but I must attend to the Greek cause, both from honor and inclination. Messrs. B. and T. are both in the Morea, where they have been very well received, and both of them write in good spirits and hopes. I am anxious to hear how the Spanish cause will be arranged, as I think it may have an influence on the Greek contest. I wish that both were fairly and favorably settled, that I might return to Italy, and talk over with you our, or rather Pietro's, adventures, some of which are all amusing, as also some of the incidents of our voyages and travels." But I reserve them, in the hope that we may laugh over them together at no very distant period."

LETTER DXCVII.

TO MR. BOWLING.

"Sep 29, 1823. "This letter will be presented to you by Mr. Hamilton Browne, who precedes or accompanies the Greek deputations. He is both capable and desirous of rendering any service to the cause, and information to the committee. He has already been of considerable advantage to both, of my own knowledge. Lord Archibald Hamilton, to whom he is related, will add a weighty recommendation than mine. "Corinth is taken, and a Turkish squadron said to be beaten in the Archipelago. The public progress of the Greeks is considerable; and internal dissensions still continue. On arriving at the seat of Government, I shall endeavor to mitigate or extinguish them—though neither is an easy task. I have remained here till now, partly in expectation of the squadron in relief of Missolonghi, partly of Mr. Parry's detachment, and partly to receive from Malta or Zante the sum of four thousand pounds sterling, which I have advanced for the payment of the expected squadron. The bills are negotiating, and will be cashed in a short time, as they would have been immediately in any other mart; but the miserable Ionian merchants have little money, and no great credit, and are besides, politestly shy on this occasion; for although I had letters of Messrs. Webb, one of the strongest houses of the Mediterranean, and also of Messrs. Ranson, there is no business to be done on 'fair terms except through English merchants. These, however, have proved both able and willing,—and upright, as usual. "Colonel Stanhope has arrived, and will proceed immediately; he shall have my co-operation in all that ends in the formation of a brigades. This present will be extremely difficult, to say the least of it. With regard to the reception of foreigners,—at least of foreign officers,—I refer you to a passage in Prince Metternich's recent letter, a copy of which is enclosed in my packet sent to the deputies. It is my
TO THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT OF GREECE.

"Cephalonia, November 30, 1823.

"The affair of the loan, the expectation so long and vainly indulged of the arrival of the Greek fleet, and the danger to which Missolonghi is still exposed, have detained me here, and will still detain me till some of them are removed. But when the money shall be advanced for the fleet, till I start for the Morea, not knowing, however, of what use my presence can be in the present state of things. We have heard some rumors of new disquisitions, nay, of the existence of a civil war. With all my heart, I pray that these reports may be false or exaggerated; for I can imagine no calamity more serious than this; and I must frankly confess, that unless union and order are established, all hopes of a loan will be in vain; and all the assistance which the Greeks could expect from abroad—an assistance neither trifling nor worthless—will be suspended or destroyed; and, what is worse, the great powers of Europe, of whom no one was an enemy to Greece, but seemed to favor her establishment of an independent power, will be persuaded that the Greeks are unable to govern themselves, and will, perhaps, themselves undertake to settle your disorders in such a way as to blast the brightest hopes of yourselves and of your friends.

"Allow me to add, once for all,—I desire the well-being of Greece, and nothing else; I will do all I can to secure it; but I cannot consent, I never will consent, that the English public, or English individuals, should be deceived as to the real state of Greek affairs. The rest, gentlemen, depends on you. You have fought gloriously,—act honorably towards your fellow-countrymen and the world, and it will then no more be said, as has been repeated for two thousand years with the Roman historians that Philipomen was the last of the Grecians. Let not emulation itself (and it is difficult, I know, to guard against it in so arduous a struggle) compare the patriot Greek, when resting from his labors, to the Turkish pacha, whom his victories have exteriorized.

"I pray you to accept these my sentiments as a sincere proof of my attachment to your real interests, and to believe that I am, and always shall be, Yours, &c."

LETTER DCCXIX.
TO PRINCE MAVROCORDATO.

"Prince.

"The present will be put into your hands by Col. Stanhope, son of Major-General the Earl of Harlington, &c. He has arrived from London in fifty days, after having visited all the committees of Germany. He is charged by our committee to act in concert with me for the liberation of Greece. I conceive that he will arrive, and his mission will have sufficient recommendation, without the necessity of any other from a foreigner, although one who, in common with all Europe, respects and admires the courage, the talents, and above all, the probity of Prince Mavrocordato.

"I am very uneasy at hearing that the dissensions of Greece still continue, and at a moment when she might triumph over every thing in general, as she has already triumphed in part. Greece is, at present, placed between three measures: either to reconquer her liberty, to become a dependence of the sovereigns of Europe, or to return to a Turkish province. She has the choice only of these three alternatives. Crimean war is but a road which leads to the last. If she is desirous of the fate of Walachia and the Crimea, she may obtain it tomorrow; if of that of Italy, the day after; but if she wishes to become truly Greek, free and independent, she must resolve to-day, or she will never again have the opportunity.

"I am, with all respect,
Your Highness's obedient servant.

"N. B.

"P. S. Your Highness will already have known that I have sought to fulfill the wishes of the Greek Government, as much as it lay in my power to do so; but I should wish that the fleet so long and so vainly expected were arrived, or, at least, that it were on the way; and especially that your Highness should approach these parts either on board the fleet, with a public mission, or in some other manner.

LETTER DC.
TO MR. BOWRING.

"Hellen, 7, 1823.

"I confirm the above; it is certainly my opinion that Mr. Millingen is entitled to the same salary with Mr. Tindall, and his service is likely to be harder.

"I have written to you (as to Mr. Hobhouse for your perusal) by various opportunities, mostly scribble; also by the deputies, and by Mr. Hamilton Browne.

"The public success of the Greeks has been considerable; Corinth taken, Missolonghi nearly safe, and some ships in the Archipelago taken for the Turks; but there is not only dissenion in the Morea, but civil war, by the latest accounts.

"He here alludes to a letter, forwarded with his own, from Mr. Millingen, who was about to join, in his mediocrity, the Submission, near Patras, and proposed of the committee an increased pay. This gentleman having mentioned in his letter "that the remnant of the Turks from before Missolonghi had rendered unnecessary the appearance of the Greek fleet," Lord Byron remarks, in a note, "that they will do so, till they obtain a loan. They have not a rup, nor credit (in the islands) to raise one. A medical man may succeed better than others; but all these penurious officers had better stand as such. Much money may not be repayed as a man."" what extent we do not yet know, but hope trifling

"For six weeks I have been expecting the fleet, which has not arrived, though I have, at the request of the Greek Government, advanced—that is, paid, and have in hand, two hundred thousand piastres (deducting the commission and bankers' charges), of my own moneys to forward their projects. The Suliotes (now in Acarnania) are very anxious that I should take them under my directions, and go over and put things to rights in the Mediterranean, which, without a force, seems impracticable.

and really, though very reluctant (as my letters will have shown you) to take such a measure, there seems hardly any milder remedy. However, I will not do any thing rashly; and have only continued here so long in the hope of seeing things reconciled, and have done all in my power thereto. Had I gone sooner, they would have forced me into one party or other, and I doubt as much now; but we will do our best.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER DCII.

TO MR. BOWRING.

October 10, 1823.

"Colonel Napier will present to you this letter.
Of his military character it was superfluous to speak; of his personal, I can say, from my own knowledge, as well as from all the reports of the men of war, that he is as excellent as his military; short, a better or a braver man is not easily to be found. He is our man to lead a regular force, or to organize a national one for the Greeks. Ask the army—ask any one. He is besides a personal friend of both Prince Mavrocordato, Colonel Stanhope, and myself, and in such concord with all three that we should all put together—an indispensable, as well as a rare point, especially in Greece at present.

"To enable a regular force to be properly organized, it will be requisite for the loan-holders to set apart at least 50,000l. sterling for that particular purpose—perhaps more—but by so doing they will guaranty their own moneys, 'and make assurance doubly sure.' They can appoint commissioners to see that part properly expended—and I recommend a similar precaution for the whole.

"I hope that the deputies have arrived, as well as some of my various despatches (chiefly addressed to Mr. Hobhouse) for the committee. Colonel Napier will tell you the recent special interposition of the gods in behalf of the Greeks—who seem to have no enemies in heaven or earth to be dreaded, but their own tendency to discord among themsewelves. But these, too, it is to be hoped, will be mitigated, and then we can take the field on the offensive, instead of being reduced to the petite guerre of defending the same fortresses year after year, and taking a few ships, and starving out a castle, and making more fuss about them than Alexander in his cups, or Bonaparte in a bulletin.
Our friends have done something in the way of the Spartans—but not one-tenth of what is told)— but have not yet inherited their style.

"Believe me yours, &c."

LETTER DCII.

TO MR. BOWRING.

October 13, 1823.

"Since I wrote to you on the 10th instant, the long-desired squadron has arrived in the waters of Missolonghi and intercepted two Turkish corvettes —ditto transports—destroying or taking all four—except some of the crews escaped on shore in Ithaca —and an unarmed vessel, with passengers, chased to a port on the opposite side of Cephalonia.
The Greeks had fourteen sail, the Turks four—but the odds don't matter—the victory will make a very good puff, and be of some advantage besides. I expect momentarily advice from Prince Mavrocor-dato, who is on board, and has (I understand) despatched letters from the Legislative for me; in consequence of which, after paying the squadron, (for which I have prepared, and am preparing,) I shall probably join him at sea or on shore.

"I have added a copy of my letter by Col. Napier, who will inform the committee of every thing in detail much better than I can do.

"The mathematical, medical, and musical preparations of the committee have arrived, and in good condition, shewing some damage from wet, and some ditto from a portion of the letter-press being split in landing—(I ought not to have omitted the press —but forgot it a moment—excuse the same)—they are excellently like their kind, but till we have an engineer and a trumpeter (we have chirurgeons already) mere 'pearls to swim,' as the Greeks are quite ignorant of mathematics, and have a bad ear for our music. The maps, &c., I will put into use for them, and take care that all (with proper cation) are turned to the intended uses of the committee—but I refer you to Colonel Napier, who will tell you, that much of your really valuable supplies should be removed till proper persons arrive to adapt them to actual service.

"Believe me, my dear sir, to be, &c.

"P. S. Private.—I have written to our friend Douglas Kinnaird on my own matters, desiring him to send me out all the further credits I can com monly trust, and have a year's income and the sale of a manor besides, he tells me, before me.—for till the Greeks get their loan, it is probable that I shall have to stand partly paymaster—as far as I am 'good upon Change,' that is to say. I pray you to repeat as much to him, and say that I must in the interim draw on Messrs. Ransom most formidably. To say the truth, I do not grudge it, now the fellows have begun to fight again—and still more welcome shall they be if they will go on. But they have had, or are to have, some four thousand pounds (besides some private extraordinaries for widows, orphans, refugees, and rascals of all descriptions) of mine at one 'sway,' and it is to be expected the next will be at least as much. And more has the enemy figured it if they will fight?—and especially if I should happen ever to be in their company? I therefore request and require that you should apprise my trusty and trustworthy men of the lease and baccarat, and crown and sheet anchor, Douglas Kinnaird the Honorable, that he prepare all moneys of mine, including the purchase-money of Rochdale manor and mine in come for the year ensuing. A. D. 1824, to answer or anticipate, any orders or drafts of mine for the good cause, in good and lawful money of Great Britain, &c., &c. May you live a thousand years!
which is nine hundred and ninety-nine longer than the Spanish Cortes Constitution."

LETTER DCIII.

TO THE HONORABLE MR. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD.

Cephalonia, Dec. 23, 1823.

"I shall be as saving of my purse and person as you recommend, but you know that it is as well to be in readiness with one or both, in the event of their being impracticable.

"I presume that some agreement has been concluded with Mr. Murray about 'Werner.' Although the copyright should only be worth two or three hundred pounds, I will tell you what can be done with them. For three hundred pounds I can man tain in Greece, at more than the fullest pay of the Provisional Government, rations included, one hundred armed men for three months. You may judge of this when I tell you, that the four thousand pounds advanced by me to the Greeks is likely to be spent and am in danger some months.

A Greek vessel has arrived from the squadron to convey me to Missolonghi, where Mavrocordato now is, and has assumed the command, so that I expect to embark immediately. Second best, however, to Cephallonia, through Messrs. Weloeh and Barry of Genoa, as usual; and get together all the means and credit of mine you can, to face the war establishment, for it is 'in for a penny, in for a pound,' and I must arm all that I can for the ancients.

I have been laboring to reconcile these parties, and there is now some hope of succeeding. Their public affairs go on well. The Turks have retreated from Arcamania without a battle, after a few fruitless attempts on Anatolike. Corinth is taken, and the Greeks have gained a battle in the Archipelago. The squadron here, too, has taken a Turkish corvette, with some money and a cargo. In short, if they can attain a fleet, I am of opinion that matters will assume and preserve a steady and favorable aspect for their independence.

In the mean time I stand paymaster, and what not; and lucky it is that, from the nature of the warfare and of the country, the resources even of an individual can be of a partial and temporary service.

Colonel Stanhope is at Missolonghi. Probably, we shall attempt Patras next. The Suliotes, who are friends of mine, seem anxious to have me with them, and so is Mavrocordato. If I can but succeed in reconciling the two parties (and I have left no stone unturned) it will be something; and in any case we must go over to the Mosquies with the western Greeks—who are the bravest, and at present the strongest, having beaten back the Turks—and try the effect of a little physical advice, should they persist in rejecting moral persuasion.

Once more recommending to you the reinforcement of my strong-box and credit from all lawful sources and resources of mine to their practicable extent—for, after all, it is better playing at nations than gaming at Almack's or Newmancourt—and requesting you to write to me as often as you can,

"I remain ever, &c."
LETTER DCV.

TO THE HONORABLE COLONEL STANHOPES.

969

"Sovereign, (or some such name,) on board a Cephalonian.

Missed, Dec. 31, 1828.

My Dear Stanhope,

"We are just arrived here, that is, part of my people and I, with some things, &c., and which it may be as well not to specify in a letter, (which has a risk of being intercepted, perhaps; but Gamba and my horses, negro, stabbing, &c., the press, and all the C-mimmittee things, also some eight thousand dollars of mine (but never mind we have more left, do you understand?) are taken by the Turkish frigates, and my party and myself, in another boat, nave had a narrow escape last night, (being close under their stern and hailed, but we would not answer, and bore away,) as well as this morning.—Here we are, with sun and clearing weather, within a pretty little port enough: but whether or Turkish friends may not send in their boats and take us out, (for we have no arms except two carbines and some pistols, and, I suspect, not more than four fighting people on board,) is another question, especially long here, since we are blocked out of Missolonghi by the direct entrance.

"You had better send my friend George Drake (Draco,) and a body of Subiotes, to escort us by land or by the canals, with all convenient speed.—Gamba and our Boublir are of course safe: tell them, I suppose; and we must take a turn at the Turks to get them out: but where the devil has the fleet gone?—the Greek, I mean; leaving us to get in without the least intimation to take heed that the Moslems were out again.

"Make my respects to Mavrocordato, and say, that I am here at his disposal. I am uneasy at being here; not so much on my own account as that of a Greek boy with me, for you know what his fate would be: and I would sooner cut him in pieces, and myself too, than have him taken out by those barbarians. We are all very well.

"N. B.

"The Bombard was twelve miles out when taken; at least so it appeared to us, (if taken she actually be,) for it is not certain;) and we had to escape from another vessel that stood right between us and the port."

LETTER DCVII.

TO MR. MUIR.

"Sovereign, Jan. 9, 1824.

My Dear Muir,

"I wish you many returns of the season and happiness therewith. Gamba and the Bombard, (there is strong reason to believe,) are carried into Patras by a Turkish frigate, which we saw chase them at dawn on the 31st; we had been close under the stern in the night, believing her a Greek till within pistol-shot, and only escaped by the miracle of all the Saints, (our captain says,) and truly I am of his opinion, for we should never have got away of ourselves. They were signaling their consort with lights, and had illuminated the ship between decks, and were shooting like a mob; but then why did they not fire? Perhaps they took us for a Greek brig and were afraid of kindling us—they had no colors flying even at dawn nor after.

"At daybreak my boat was on the coast; but the wind unfavorable for the port:—a large vessel with the wind in her favor standing between us and the Gulf, and another in chase of the Bombard about twelve miles off or so. Soon after they stood (i.e. the Bombard and our boat,) apparently towards Patras, and a Zantiotie boat making signals to us from the shore to get away. Away we went before the wind, and ran into a creek called Soroes, I believe where I landed Luke* and another, (as Luke's life was in most danger,) with some money for them selves, and a letter for Stanhope, and sent them up the country to Missolonghi, where they would be in safety, as the place where we were, could be assailed by armed boats in a moment, and Gamba had all our arms except two carbines, a fowling-piece, and some pistols.

"In less than an hour the vessel in chase neared us, and we dashed out again, and showing our stern, (our boat sails very well,) got in before night to Dragomestri, where we now are. But where is the Greek fleet? I don't know—do you? I told our master of the boat that I was inclined to think the two large vessels (there were none else in sight,) Greeks. But he answered 'they are too large—why don't they show their colors?' and his account was confirmed, be it true or false, by several boats which we met or passed, as we could not at any rate have got in with that wind without beating about for a long time; and as there was much property and some lives to risk (the boy's especially) without any means of defence, it was necessary to let our boat men have their own way.

"I despatched yesterday another messenger to Missolonghi for an escort, but we have yet no answer. We are here (those of my boat) for the fifth day without taking our clothes off, and sleeping on deck in all weathers, but are all very well, and in good spirits. It is to be supposed that the government will send, for their own safety, and, as I have sixteen thousand dollars on board, the greater part for their service. I had (besides personal property to the amount of about five thousand more,) eight thousand dollars in specie of my own, without reckoning the committee's stores, so that the Turks will have a good thing of it if the prize be good.

"I regret the detention of Gamba, &c., but the rest we can make up again, so tell Hancock to set to work, and prepare to make his appearance, and I beg to prepare the remainder of my credit with Messrs. Webb to be turned into moneys. I shall remain here, unless something extraordinary occurs, till Mavrocordato sends an then go on, and act according to circumstances. My respects to the two colonels, and remembrances to all friends. Tell 'Ultima Avis,' that his friend Raidi did not make his appearance with the brig, though I think he might as well have spoken with us or off Zante, to give us a gentle hint of what we had to expect.

"Yours ever affectionately,

"N. B.

"P. S. Excuse my scrawl on account of the pen and the frosty morning at daybreak. A boy's hasto, a boat starting for Kalamo. I do not know whether the detention of the Bombard, (if she be detained, for I cannot swear to it,) and I can only judge from appearances, and what all these fellows say,) be an affair of the government, and neutrality, and &c.,—but she was stopped at least twelve miles distant from any port, and had all her papers regular from Zante for Kalamo, and we also. I did not land at Zante, being anxious to lose as little time as possible, but Sir F. S. came off to invite me, &c., and everybody was as kind as could be, even in Cephalonia."

who had leisure to hear him laughing, and in a minute after the vessel drove off again after striking

"To be brief, we had bad weather almost always, though not contrary; slept on deck in the wet gen for a quarter of an hour on the evening of the fourth instant in the sea (to kill the fleas, and other &c.), and was all the better for it.

"We were received at Missolonghi with all kinds of kindness and honors; and the sight of the fleet saluting, &c., and the crowds and different cus tomaries, was really picturesque. We think of under taking an expedition soon, and I expect to be ordered with the Suliotes to join the army.

"All well at present. We found Gamba al ready arrived, and every thing in good condition.
Remember me to all friends.

Yours ever,

N. B.

P. S. You will, I hope, use every exertion to realize the assets. For besides what I have already advanced, I have undertaken to pay all the annui totes for a year, (and will accompany them, either as a chief, or (whichever is most agreeable to the government,) besides sundries. I do not under stand Brown's "letters of credit." I neither gave nor ordered a letter of credit that I know of; and though of course, if you have done it, I will be responsible, I was not aware of any thing except that I would have backed his bills, which you said was unnecessary. As to orders— I ordered a thousand but some red cloth and oil cloths, both of which I am ready to receive, but if Gamba has exceeded my commission, the other things must be sent back for I cannot permit any thing of the kind, nor will. The servants' journey will of course be paid for, though that is exorbitant. As for Brown's letter, I do not know anything more than I have said, and I really cannot defray the charges of half Greece, and the French and English besides. However, I will pay you as some dollars soon, for the expenses fall on me for the present.

January 14, 1824.

P. S. Will you tell Saint (Jew) Goronimo Corgiolengo that I mean to draw for the balance of my credit with Messrs. Webb & Co. I shall draw for two thousand dollars, (that being about the amount, more or less;) but to facilitate the business, I shall make the draft payable also at Messrs. Han som & Co., Pall-Mall East, London. I believe I already showed you my letters, (but if not, I have to show,) by which, besides the credits now realizing, you will have perceived that I am not limited to any particular amount of credit with my bankers. The Honorable Douglas, my friend and trustee, is a principal partner in that house, and having the direction of my affairs, is aware to what extent my pressed resources may go, and the letters in question were from him. I can merely say, that within the current year, 1824, besides the money already advanced to the Greek government, and the credits now in your hands and your partner's, (Mr.
Darby,) which are all from the end of 1823, I have anticipated nothing from that of the present year hitherto. I shall or ought to have at my disposition upwards of one hundred thousand dol ars, (including the interest, and the purchase of the ey of a manor lately sold,) and perhaps more, without infringing on my income for 1824, and not including the remaining balance of 1823.
LETTER DCX.

TO MR. CHARLES HANCOCK.

"Moleondghi, Jan. 17, 1824."

"I have answered, at some length, your obliging letter, and trust that you have received my reply by means of Mr. Thidal. I will also thank you to remind Mr. Thidal that I would thank him to furnish you, on my account, with an order of the committee for one hundred dollars, which I advanced to him on their account through Signor Corgialeno's agency at Corfu, and which I desist from demanding at present, as I believe that the said committee should pay their own expenses. An order will be sufficient, as the money might be inconvenient for Mr. T. at present to disburse.

I have also advanced to Mr. Blackett the sum of fifty dollars, which I will thank Mr. Stevens to pay to you, on my account, from moneys of Mr. Blackett, now in his hands. I have Mr. B.'s acknowledgment in writing.

"As the wants of the State here are still pressing, and there seems very little specie stirring except mine, I still stand paymaster, and must again request you and Mr. Barff to forward by a safe channel (if possible) all the dollars you can collect on the bills now negotiating. I have also written to Corgialeno for two thousand dollars, being about the balance of my separate letter from Messrs. Warden and Co., and making the bills also payable at Ransom's in London.

"Things are going on better, if not well; there is some order, and considerable preparation. I expect to accompany the troops on an expedition shortly, which makes me particularly anxious for the remaining remittance, as 'money is the sinew of war,' and of peace, too, as far as I can see, for I am sure there would be no peace here without it. However, a little does go a long way, which is comfort. The government of the Morea and of Candia have written to me for a further advance from my own pecuniary of twenty or thirty thousand dollars, to which I demur for the present, (having undertaken to pay the Suliotes as a free gift and other things already, besides the loan which I have already advanced,) till I receive letters from England, which I have reason to expect.

"When the expected credits arrive, I hope that you will bear a hand, otherwise I must have recourse to Malta, which will be losing time and taking trouble; but I do not wish you to do more than is perfectly agreeable to Mr. Barff and to yourself. I am very well, and have had considerable correspondence with my personal treatment, or with the posture of public affairs—others must speak for themselves.

"Yours ever and truly, &c.

"P. S. Respects to Colonels Wright and Dulce, and the officers civil and military; also to my friends Muir and Stevens particularly, and the Doleadecina."

TO MR. CHARLES HANCOCK.

"The expedition of about two thousand men is planned for an attack on Lepanto; and for reasons of policy with regard to the native Capitani, who would rather be (nominally at least) under the command of a foreigner than one of their own body, the direction, it is said, is to be given to me. There is another reason, which is, that if a capitulation should take place, the Mussulmans might perhaps, rather have Christian faith with a Frank than with a Greek, as it is inexpedient to accede a point or two. These appear to be the most obvious motives for such an appointment, as far as I can judge, unless there be one reason more, viz., that, under present circumstances, no one else (not even..."
Mavrocordato himself) seems disposed to accept such a nomination—and though my desires are as far as my deserts upon this occasion, I do not decline it, being willing to do as I am bid; and I pay a considerable part of the claus, I may as well see what they are likely to do for their money; besides I am tired of hearing nothing but talk. * * * I presume, from the retardation, that he* is the target for Parry who attempted the North Pole, and is (it may be supposed) now essaying the South."

LETTER DCXIII.

TO MR. CHARLES HANCOCK.

"Missolonghi, Feb. 5, 1824.

"Dr. Muir's letter and yours of the 23d reached me some days ago. Tell Muir that I am glad of his promotion for his sake, and of his remaining near us for all our sakes: though I cannot but regret Dr. Kenyon's removal, which, for the previous earthquakes and the present English weather in this climate. With all respect to my medical pastor, I have to announce to him, that among other things, he must fire-master. Just landed I have disembarked an elect blacksmith, entrusted with three hundred and twenty-two Greek Testaments. I have given him all facilities in my power for his works spiritual and temporal, and if he can settle matters as easily with the Greek Archbishop and hierarchy, I trust that neither the heretic nor the supposed skeptic will be accused of intolerance.

"By-the-way, I met with the said Archbishop at Ancona, who was about to take a cruise of the Priate a few days ago, and was received with a heavier cannonade than the Turks, probably) for the second time, (I had known him here before;) and he and I Mavrocordato, and the Chiefs and Priates and I, all dined together, and I thought the metropolitan the merriest of the party, and a very good Christian for all that. But Gamba (we got wet through in our way back) has been ill with a fever and colic; and Luke has been out of sorts too, and so have some others of the people, and I have been very well,—except that I caught cold yesterday with sneezing too much in the rain at the Greek Church. I had landed the committee stores, and newly spotted our combustibles; but I turned out in person, and made such a row as set them in motion, blaspemathing at them from the government downwards, till they actually did some part of what they ought to have done several days before, and this is esteemed, as it deserves to be, a wonder.

"Tell Muir that, notwithstanding his remonstrances, which I receive thankfully, it is perhaps best that I should advance with the troops; for if we do not do something soon we shall only have a third year of defensive operations and another siege, and all that. We hear that the Turks are coming down in force, and sooner than usual; and as these fellows do mind me a little, it is the opinion that I should go,—firstly, because they will sooner listen to a foreigner than one of their own people, out of native jealousies; secondly, because the Turks will sooner treat or capitulate (if such occasion should happen) with a Frank than a Greek; and, thirdly, because nobody else seems disposed to take the responsibility.—Mavrocordato being very busy here, the Ministers and our Parlements, and, after all, he left better end with a bullet than bark in his body. If we are not taken off with the sword, we are like to march off with an auge in this mud-basket; and to conclude with a very bad pun, to the ear rather than to the eye, better marially, than the situation of Missolonghi is not unknown to you. The dykes of Holland, when broken down, are the Deserts of Arabia for dryness, in comparison.

"And with regard to the sinners of war. I thank you and Mr. Barff for your ready answers, which, next to ready money, is a pleasant thing. Besides the assets, and balance, and the relics of the Corigliano correspondence with Leghorn and Genoa, (I sold the dog flour, tell him, but not at his price,) I shall request and require, from the beginning of March ensuing, about five thousand dollars every two months, i. e., about twenty-five thousand without the current year, at regular intervals, independent of the sums now negotiating. I can show you documents to prove that these are considerably within my supplies for the year in more ways than one; but I do not like to tell the Greeks exactly what I would or would not receive on an exact balance, otherwise, they will double and triple their demands, (a disposition that they have already sufficiently shown;) and though I am willing to do all I can see and necessary, yet I do not say that they should not help a little, for they are not quite so bare as they pretend to be by some accounts.

"I have been interrupted by the arrival of Parry, and afterward by the return of Hesketh, but the former has not brought an answer to my epistles, which rather surprises me. You will write soon I suppose. Parry seems a fine rough subject, but will hardly be ready for the field these three weeks; he and I (I think) be able to draw together—at least I will not interfere with or contradict him in his own department. He complains grievously of the mercantile and outwrengmy part of the committee, but greatly praises Gordon and Hume. Gordon would have given three or four thousand pounds and come out himself, but Kennedy or somebody else disgust him, and thus they have spoiled part of their subscriptions. Also something says Bowring is a humbug, to which I say nothing. He sorely laments the printing and civilizing expenses, and wishes that there was not a Sunday-school in the world, or any school here at present, save and except always an academy for artilleryship.

"He complained also of the cold, a little to my surprise; firstly, because, there being no chimneys, I have used myself to do without other warmth than the animal heat and one's cloak, in these parts; and secondly, because I should as soon have expected to hear a volcano sneeze, as a fire-master (who is to burn a whole fleet) exclaim against the atmosphere. I do not think you have a proper approach would have scorched up the town like the burning-glasses of Archimedes.

"Well, it seems that I am to be Commander-in-chief, and the post is by no means a sinecure for we are not what Major Sturgeon calls 'a set of the most amicable officers.' Whether we shall have a boxing 'bout between Captain Sheer and the Colonel, I cannot tell; but, between the calling of chiefs, German Baronets and English volunteers, and adventurers of all nations, we are likely to form as goodly an armed army as ever quarrelled beneath the same banner.

"Feb. 8, 1824.

"Interrupted again by business yesterday, and it is time to conclude my letter. I drew some time since on Mr. Barff for a thousand dollars to complete some money wanted by the government. The had government got cash on that bill here and at a profit; but the very same fellow who gave it to them, after proposing to give me money for other bills on Barff to the amount of thirteen hundred dollars, either could not, or thought better of it. I had written to Barff advising him, but had afterward to write to tell him of the fellow's having not come up to time. You must really send me the balance soon. I have the artilleryists and my Suliotes to pay, and Heaven knows how to make as early a return besides, and as every thing depends upon punctuality, all our operations will be at a stand-still unless you use despatch. I shall send to Mr. Barff or to you further bills on England for three thousand pounds, to be negotiated as speedily as you can. I have already stated here and formerly the sums I can command at home within the year,—without including my credits, or the bills already negotiated or negotiating, as Gorgialeno's balance of Mr. Webb's letter,—and my letters from my friends (received by Mr. Parry's vessel), confirm what I have already stated. How much I may require in the course of the year I can't tell, but I will take care that it shall not exceed the means to supply it.

"Yours ever,

"N. B."

"P.S. I have had, by desire of a Mr. Jerostati, to draw on Dometrius Delledecima (is it our friend in ultima analise?) to pay the committee expenses, I really do not understand what the committee mean by some of their freedoms. Parry and I get on very well hitherto; how long this may last, Heaven knows, but I hope it will, for a good deal for the Greek service depends upon it, but he has already had some miff's with Col. S., and, I do all I can to keep the peace among them. However, Parry is a fine fellow, extremely active, and of strong, sound, practical talents, by all accounts. Enclosed are bills for three thousand pounds, drawn in the mode directed, (i.e. parcelled out in smaller bills.) A good opportunity occurring for Cephalonia to send letters on, I avail myself of it. Remember me to Stevens, and to all friends. Also my compliments and every thing kind to the colonels and officers.

"February 9, 1824,

"P.S. 2d or 3d. I have reason to expect a person from England directed with papers (on business) for me to sign, somewhere in the islands, by-and-by; if such should arrive, would you forward him to me by a safe conveyance, as the papers regard a transaction with regard to the adjustment of a lawsuit, and a sum of several thousand pounds, which I, or my bankers and trustees for me, may have to receive (in England) in consequence. The time of the probable arrival I cannot state, but the date of my letters is the 2d Nov., and I suppose that he ought to arrive soon."

LETTER DCXIV.

TO ANDREW LONDO.

"Dear Friend,

"The sight of your handwriting gave me the greatest pleasure. Greece has ever been for me, as it must be for all men of any feeling or education, the promised land of valor, of the arts, and of liberty; nor did the time I passed in my youth in travelling among her ruins at all chill my affection for the birth-place of heroes. In addition to this, I am bound to myself by ties of friendship and gratitude for the hospitality which I experienced from you during my stay in that country, of which you are now become one of the first defenders and ornaments. To see myself serving, by your side and under your eyes, in the cause of Greece, will be to me one of the happiest events of my life. In the mean time, with the hope of our again meeting,

LETTER DCXV.

TO HIS HIGNESS YUSUFF PACHA.

"Highness!

"A vessel, in which a friend and some domestick of mine were embarked, was destined a few days ago and released by order of your Highness. I have now to thank you; not for liberating the vessel, which, as carrying a neutral flag, and being under British protection, no one had a right to detain; but for having treated my friends with so much kindness while they were in your hands.

"In the hope, therefore, that it may not be altogether displeasing to your Highness, I have requested the governor of this place to release four Turkish prisoners, and he has humbly consented to do so. I lose no time, therefore, in sending them back, in order to make as early a return as I could for your courtesy on the late occasion. These prisoners are liberated without any conditions: but, should the circumstance find a place in your recollection, I venture to beg that your Highness will treat such Greeks as may henceforth fall into your hands with humanity; more especially since the horrors of war are sufficiently great in themselves, without being aggravated by wanton cruelties on either side.

"NOEL BROWN"

LETTER DCXVI.

TO MR. BARFF.

"Feb. 2d.

"I am a good deal better, though of course weakly; the leeches took too much blood from my temples the day after, and there was some difficulty in stopping it, but I have since been up daily, and put in boats or on horseback. To-day I have taken a warm bath, and live as temperately as can well be, without any liquid but water, and without animal food.

"Besides the four Turks sent to Patras, I have obtained the release of four-and-twenty women and children, and sent them at my own expense to Prevesa, that the English consul-general may sign them to their relations. I did this by their own desire. Matters here are a little embroiled with the Suliotes and foreigners, &c., but I still hope better things, and will stand by the cause as long as my health and circumstances will permit me to be supposed useful.*

"I am obliged to support the government here for the present."

[The prisoners mentioned in this letter as having been released by him and sent to Prevesa had been held in captivity at Missolonghi since the beginning of the Revolution. The following was the letter which he forwarded with them to the English Consul at Prevesa.]

LETTER DCXVII.

TO MR. MAYER.

"Sir,

"Coming to Greece, one of my principal objects was to alleviate as much as possible the miseries inrident to a warfare so cruel as the present. When the dictates of humanity are in question, I know no difference between you and Greeks. It is enough that those who want assistance are men, in order to claim the pity and protection of the meanest pret-tender to human feelings. I have found here twenty-four Turks, including women and children, who have long pined in distress, far from the means of support and the consolations of their home.

The government has consigned them to me: I transmit them to Frevesa, whither they desire to be sent. I hope they will be under the care that they may be restored to a place of safety, and that the Governor of your town may accept of my present. The best recompense I can hope for would be to find that I had inspired the Ottoman commanders with the same sentiments towards these unhappy Greeks who may hereafter fall into their hands.

I beg you to believe me, &c.

LETTER DCXVIII.

TO THE HONORABLE DOUGLAS KINNAIRD.

"Mansfield, Feb. 21, 1824.

"I have received yours of the 23d of November. It is essential that the money should be paid, as I have drawn it for all, and more too, to help the Greeks. Parry is here, and he and I agree very well; and all is going on hopefully for the present, considering circumstances.

"We shall have work this year, for the Turks are coming down in force; and, as for me, I must stand by the cause. I shall shortly march (according to orders) against Lepanto, with two thousand men. I have less, after some narrow escapes from the Turks, and also from being shipwrecked. We were twice upon the rocks, but this you will have heard, truly or falsely, through other channels, and I do not wish to bore you with a long story.

"So far I have succeeded in supporting the Government of Western Greece, which would otherwise have been dissolve. If you have received the eleven hundred and odd pounds, these, with what I have in hand, and my income for the current year, to say nothing of contingencies, will, or might, enable me to keep the "sineus of war" properly strung. If the deputies be honest fellows, and obtain the loan, they will repay the 400,000l. as agreed upon; and even then I shall save little, or indeed less than little, since I am maintaining nearly the whole machine—in this place, at least—at my own cost. But let the Greeks only succeed, and I don't care for myself.

"I have been very seriously unwell, but am getting better, and can ride about again; so pray quiet our friends on that score.

"It is not true that I ever did, will, would, could, or should write a satire against Gifford, or a hair of his head. I always considered him as my literary father, and myself as his "prodigal son;" and if I have allowed him (fatted call to grow to an ox before he kills it on my return, it is only because I prefer beef to veal.

"Yours, &c."
and children, and sent them to Patras and Preveza, at my own charges. One little girl of nine years old, who prefers remaining with me, I shall (if I live) send, with her mother, probably, to Italy, to England. Her name is Hato, or Hatage. She is a very pretty, lively child. All her brothers were killed by the Greeks, and she herself and her mother merely spared by special favor and owing to her extreme youth, she being then but five years old.

"My health is now better, and I ride about again. My office here is no sinecure, so many parties and difficulties of every kind; but I will do what I can. Prince Mavrocordato is an excellent person, and does all in his power, but his situation is perplexing in the extreme. Still we have great hopes of the success of the contest. You will hear, however, more of public news from plenty of quarters, for I have little time to write.

"Believe me yours, &c., &c.,

"N. B."

LETTER DCXLI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Miscougli, Western Greece, March 4, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR,

Your reproach is unfounded—I have received the letters from you, and answered those previous to leaving Cephalonia. I have not been 'quiet' in an Ionian island, but much occupied with business, as the Greek deputies (if arrived) can tell you. Neither have I continued 'Don Juan,' nor any other poem. You know as usual, I presume, by some newspaper report or other.

"When the proper moment to be of some use, arrived, I came here; and am told that my arrival (with some other circumstances) has been of, at least, temporary advantage to the cause. I had a narrow escape from the Turks, and another from shipwreck on my passage. On the 15th (or 16th) of February I had an attack of apoplexy, or epilepsy, the physicians have not exactly decided which, but the alternative is agreeable. My constitution, therefore, remains between the two opinions, like Mahomet's sarcophagus between the magnets. All that I can say is, but they nearly warned me to death, by placing the leeches too near the temporal artery, so that the blood could with difficulty be stopped, even with caustic. I am supposed to be getting better, slowly, however. But my homilies will I presume, for the future, be like the Archbishop of Grenada's—in this case, 'I order you a hundred duvets from my treasurer, and wish you a little more taste.'"

"For public matters I refer you to Col. Stanhope's and Capt. Parr's reports—and to all other reports whatsoever. There is plenty to do—war without, and tumult within—they 'kill a man a week,' like Hob Acres in the country. Parr's artificers have gone away in alarm, on account of a dispute, in which some of the natives and foreigners were engaged, and a Swede was killed, and a Suliote wounded. In the middle of their fight there was a strong shock of an earthquake; so, between that and the sword, they boomed off it a burrry in despite of all dissensions to the contrary A Turkish brig ran ashore, &c., &c., &c."

"I can answer either publishing or mediating that same. Let me hear from and of you, and believe me, in all events,

"Ever and affectionately yours,

"N. B."

LETTER DCXXIII.

TO MR. BARFF.

March 5, 1824.

"If Siseni* is sincere, he will be treated with, and well treated; if he is not, the sin and the shame may lie at his own door. One great object is to heal those internal dissensions for the future, without exacting too rigorous an account of the past. Prince Mavrocordato is of the same opinion, and whoever is disposed to act fairly will be fairly dealt with. I have heard a good deal of Siseni, but not a deal of good; however, I never judge from report, particularly in a revolution. Personally, I am rather obliged to him, for he has been very hospitable to all friends of mine who have passed through his district. You may therefore assure him that any overture for the advantage of Greece and its internal pacification will be readily and sincerely met here. I hardly think that he would have ventured a deceitful proposition to me through you, because he must be sure that in such a case it would eventually be exposed. At any rate, the healing of these dissensions is so important a point, that something must be risked to obtain it."

LETTER DCXXIV.

TO MR. BARFF.

March 10.

Enclosed is an answer to Mr. Parrucu's letter, and I hope that you will assure him from me, that I have done and am doing all I can to reunitie the Greeks with the Greeks.

I am extremely obliged by your offer of your company to the Greek Government, and I do not think that I ought to abandon Roumeli for the Peloponnesus until that Government shall desire it; and the more so, as this part is exposed in a greater degree to the enemy. Nevertheless, if my presence can really be of any assistance in uniting two or more parties, I am ready to go anywhere, either as a mediator, or, if necessary, as a hostage. In these affairs, I have neither private views, nor private dislike of any individual, but this sincere wish of deserving the name of the friend of your country, and of her patriots."

LETTER DCXXV.

TO MR. PARREU.

March 10, 1824.

"Sir,

I have the honor of answering your letter. My first wish has always been to bring the Greeks to agree among themselves. I came here by the invitation of the Greek Government, and I do not think that I ought to abandon Roumeli for the Peloponnesus until that Government shall desire it; and the more so, as this part is exposed in a greater degree to the enemy. Nevertheless, if my presence can really be of any assistance in uniting two or more parties, I am ready to go anywhere, either as a mediator, or, if necessary, as a hostage. In these affairs, I have neither private views, nor private dislike of any individual, but this sincere wish of deserving the name of the friend of your country, and of her patriots."

LETTER DCXXVI.

TO MR. CHARLES HANCOCK.

Missolonghi, March 10, 1824.

"Sir,

I sent by Mr. J. M. Hodges a bill drawn on Signor C. Jerostati for the hundred and eighty-six pounds, on account of the Hesper. I have been present on the Greek Committee, for carrying on the service at this place. But Count Delladecima sent no more than two hundred dollars until he should receive instructions from C. Jerostati. Therefore I am obliged to advance that sum to prevent a positive stop being put to the laboratory service at this place, &c., &c.

I beg you will mention this business to Count Delladecima, who has the draft and every account, and that Mr. Barff, in conjunction with yourself, will endeavor to arrange this money account, and, when received forward the same to Missolonghi."

LETTER DCXXVII.

TO DR. KENNEDY.

March 10, 1824.

"Dear Sir,

You could not disapprove of the motto to the Telegraph, and do not do it, for the Telegrapb did, and set forth this land of liberty, where most people do as they please, and few as they ought.

I have not written, nor am inclined to write, for that or any other paper, but have suggested to them, over and over, a change of the motto and style. However, I do not think that it will turn out either an irreligious or a levelling publication, and they promise due respect to both churches and things, as the former do.

Ifhamer would write for the Greek Chronicle, he might have his own price for articles.

There is a slight demur about Hato's voyage, her mother wishing to go with her, which is quite natural, and I have not the heart to refuse it; for even Mahomet made a law, that in the division of captives, the child should never be separated from the mother. But this may make a difference in her arrangement, although the poor woman who has..."
Gamba's you eat, Bealed. That they were, Co worse. The weather is so much finer, that I get a good deal of moderate exercise in boats and on horseback, and I am willing to hope that my health is not worse than when you kindly wrote to me. Dr. Bruno can tell you that I adhere to your regimen, and more, for I do not eat any meat, even fish.

Believe me ever, &c.

P. S. The mechanics (six in number) were all pretty much of the same mind. Brownbill was but one. Perhaps they are less to blame than I imagined, since Colonel Stanhope is said to have told them, 'that he could not positively say their lives were safe.' I should like to know whether our life is safe, either here or any where else? With regard to a place of safety, at least such hermetically-sealed safety as these persons appeared to desire, it is not to be found in Greece, at any rate; but Missolonghi was supposed to be the place where they would be useful, and their risk was no greater than that of others.

LETTER DCXXVIII.

TO COLONEL STANHOPE.

'My Dear Stanhope,'

'Missolonghi, March 19, 1804.

'Prince Mavrocordato and myself will go to Salona to meet Ulysses, and you may be very sure that P. M. will accept any proposition for the advantage of Greece. Parry is to answer for himself on his own articles; if I were to interfere with him, it would only stop him from engaging in his exertions, and he is really doing all that can be done without more aid from the government.

'What can be spared will be sent; but I refer you to Captain Humphries's report, and to Count Ganghæ's letter for details upon all subjects.

'In the hope of seeing you soon, and deferring much that will be to be said till then,

'Believe me ever, &c.'

P. S. Your two letters (to me) are sent to Mr. Barff, as you desire; I pray you to remember me particularly to Treawney, whom I shall be much pleased to see again.'

LETTER DCXXX.

TO MR. BARFF.

'March 19.

'As Count Mercati is under some apprehensions of a direct answer to him personally on Greek affairs, I reply (as you requested me) to the person who will have the goodness to communicate to him the enclosed.

'It is the joint answer of Prince Mavrocordato and myself, to Signor Georgio Sisseni's propositions. You may also add, both to him and to Furrate, that I am perfectly sincere in desiring the most amicable termination of their internal dissensions, and that I believe P. Mavrocordato to be so also otherwise I would not act with him or any other, whether native or foreigner.

'If Lord Guilford is at Zante, or, if he is not, if Signor Tricupi is there, you would oblige me by presenting my respects to one or both, and by telling them, that from every one I foretold to Colonel Stanhope and to P. M., that there existed a newspaper (or indeed any other) in the present state of Greece might and probably would tend to much mischief and misconception, unless under some restrictions, (as they are, or will be,) at his earliest convenience, and (what will appear laughable enough) to such a degree that he charged me with despotick principles, and I his with ultra-radicalism.

'Dr. * *, the editor, with his unreserve free dom of the press, and who has the freedom to exercise an unlimited discretion,—not allowing any article but his own and those like them to appear,—and in declaiming against restrictions, cuts, carves, and restricts (as they will, me,) at his pleasure. He is the author of an article against monachy, of which he may have the advantage and fame—but they (the editors) will get themselves into a scrape, if they do not take care.

'Of all petty tyrants, he is one of the pettiest, as are most demagouges, that ever I knew. He is a Swiss by birth, and a Greek by assumption, having married a wife, and changed his religion.

'I shall be very glad, and am extremely anxious for some favorable result to the recent pacific overtures of the contending parties in the Peloponnes.'
LETTER DCXXX.

"March 26.

"Since your intelligence with regard to the Greek loan, P. Mavrocordato has shown to me an extract from some correspondence of his, by which it would appear that three commissioners are to be named to see that the amount is placed in proper hands for the service of the country, and that my name is among the number. Of this, however, we have as yet only the report. This commission is apparently named by the committee or the contracting parties in England. I am of opinion that such a commission will be necessary, but the office will be both delicate and difficult. The weather, which has lately been equinoctial, has flooded the country, and will probably retard our proceeding to Salona for some days, till the road becomes more practicable.

"You were already apprized that P. Mavrocordato and myself had been invited to a conference by Ulysses and the chiefs of Eastern Greece. I hear (and am indeed consulted on the subject) that in case the remittance of the first advance of the loan should not arrive immediately, the Greek General Government mean to try to raise some thousand dollars in the islands in the interim, to be repaid from the earliest instalments on their arrival. What prospect of success they may have, or on what conditions, you can tell better than me: I suppose, if the loan be confirmed, something might be done by them, but subject of course to the usual terms. You can let them and me know your own opinion. There is an imperious necessity for some national fund, and that speedily, otherwise what is to be done? The auxiliary corps of about two hundred men paid by me, are, I believe, the sole regularly and properly furnished with the money, due to them weekly, and the officers monthly. It is true that the Greek government gives their rations, but we have had three mutinies, owing to the badness of the bread, which neither native nor stranger could masticate (nor dogs either), and there is still great difficulty in obtaining them even provisions of any kind.

"There is a dissension among the Germans about the conduct of the agents of their committee, and an examination has taken place among them themselves. Whether the result may be, cannot be anticipated, except that it will end in a row, of course, as usual.

"The English are all very amicable, as far as I know; we get on too with the Greeks very tolerably, always making allowance for circumstances; and we have no quarrels with the foreigners."

LETTER DCXXXII.

TO MR. BARRFF.

"April 2.

"There is a quarrel, not yet settled, between the citizens and some of Carissacchi's people, which has already produced some blows. I keep my people quite neutral; but have ordered them to be on their guard.

"Some days ago we had an Italian private soldier drummed out for thieving. The German officers wanted to flog him; but I flatly refused to permit the use of the stick or whip, and delivered him over to the police. Since then a Prussian officer rioted in his lodgings; and I put him under arrest, according to the order. This, it appears, did not please his German confederation: but I stuck by my text; and have given them plainly to understand, that those who do not choose to be amenable to the laws of the country and service, may retire; but that in all that I have to do, I will see them obeyed by foreigner or native.

"I wish something was heard of the arrival of part of the loan, for there is a plentiful dearth of everything at present."

LETTER DCXXXIII.

TO MR. BARRFF.

"April 3.

"Since I wrote, we have had some tumult here with the citizens and Carissacchi's people, which are all under arms, our boys and all. They nearly fired on me and fifty of my lads, by mistake, as we were taking our usual excursion into the country. To-day matters are not settled, or subsiding; but about an hour ago, the father-in-law of the landlord of the house where I am lodged (one of the principals the said landlord is) was arrested for high treason.

"They are in conclave still with Mavrocordato; and we have a number of new faces from the hills, come to assist, they say. Gun-boats and batteries all ready, &c.

"The row has had one good effect—it has put them on the alert. What is to become of the father-in-law, I do not know; nor what he has done, ex nihilo; but

*To a very fine thing to be father-in-law. To a very magnificent three-backed bear."

* A corps of fifty horsemen, his escort-guard.
as the man in Bluebeard says and sings. I wrote to you upon matters at length, some days ago; the letter, or letters, you will receive with this. We are desirous to hear more of the loan; and it is some time since I have had any letters (at least of an interesting description) from England, excepting one of 4th Feb., from Bowring (of no great importance). My latest dates are of 9th, or of the 6th 10th days of four months exactly. I hope you get well on well in the islands; here most of us are, or have been, more or less indisposed, natives as well as foreigners."

LETTER DCXXXV.

TO MR. BARFF.

"April 7."

"The Greeks here of the government have been boring me for more money. As I have the brigade maintain, and the campaign is apparently now to cease, and as I have already spent thirty thousand dollars in three months upon them in one way or another, and more especially as their public loan has succeeded, so that they ought not to draw from individuals at that rate, I have given them a refusal, and—as they would not take that,—another refusal in terms of considerable sincerity."

"They wish now to try in the islands for a few thousand dollars on the ensuing loan. If you can serve them, perhaps you will, (in the way of information, at any rate,) and I will see that you have fair play, but still I do not advise you, except to act as you please. Almost every thing depends upon the arrival, and the speedy arrival, of a portion of the loan to keep peace among themselves. If they can but have sense to do this, I think that they will be a match and better for any force that can be brought against them for the present. We are all doing as well as we can."

EXTRACTS FROM A JOURNAL.

BEGUN NOVEMBER 14, 1813.

"If this had been begun ten years ago, and faithfully kept!—(heigho! there are too many things I wish never to have remembered, as it is. Well—I have had my share of what are called the pleasures of this life, and I have seen more of the European and Asiatic world than I have made a good use of. They say 'virtue is its own reward,'—it certainly should be paid well for its trouble. At five-and-twenty, when the better part of life is over, one should be something—and what am I? nothing but five-and-twenty—and the old months. What have I seen? the same man all over the world,—ay, and woman too. Give me a Mussulman who never asks questions, and a she of the same race who saves one the trouble of putting them. But for this same plague—yellow-fever—and Newstead delay, I should have been by this time a second time close to the Buxine. If I can overcome the last, I don't so much mind your pestilence; and, at any rate, the spring shall see me there,—provided I neither marry myself nor unmarry any one else in the interval. I wish one was—I don't know what I wish. It is odd I never set myself seriously to wishing without attaining it—and repenting. I begin to believe with the good old Magi, that one should only pray for the nation, and not for the individual;—but, on my principle, this would not be very patriotic.

"No more reflections.—Let me see—last night I finished 'Zuleika,'* my second Turkish Tale. I believe the composition of it kept me alive—for it was written to drive my thoughts from the recollection of—"

* The Bride of Aitz

At least, even here, my hand would tremble to write it. This afternoon I have burned the scenes of my commenced comedy. I have some idea of expecting a romance, or rather a tale, in prose;—but what romance could equal the events—"

"To-day Henry Byron called on me with my little cousin Eliza. She will grow up a beauty and a plague; but, in the mean time, it is the prettiest child! dark eyes and eyelashes, black and long as the wing of a raven. I think she is prettier even than my niece, Georgiana,—yet I don't like to think so neither; and, though older, she is not so clever. "Dallas called before I was up, so we did not meet. Lewis, too—who seems out of humor with every thing. What can be the matter? he is not married—has he lost his own mistress, or any other person's wife? Hodgson, too, came. He is going to be married, and he is the kind of man who will be the happier. He has talent, cheerfulness, every thing that can make him a pleasing companion; and his intended is handsome and young, and all that. But I never see any one much improved by matrimony. All my coupled contemporaries are bald and discontented. W. and S. have both lost their hair and good-humor; and the last of the two had a good deal to lose. But it doesn't much signify what falls off a man's temples in that state."

"Mem. I must get a toy to-morrow for Eliza and send the device for the scale of myself and * * * * * Mem. too, to call on the Staél and Lady Holland to-morrow, and on * *, who has advised me (without seeing it, by-the-by) not to publish 'Zuleika;' I believe he is right, but experience might have taught him that not to print is physically impossible. No one has seen it but Hodgson and Mr. Gifford. I never in my life read a composition, save to Hodgson, as he pays me in kind. It is a horrible thing to do too frequently—better print, and they who like may read, and, if they don't like you have the satisfaction of knowing that they are still in my possession.

"I have declined presenting the Doctor's Petition, being sick of parliamentary mummeries. I have spoken three; but I doubt my ever becoming an orator. My first was liked; the second and the third not. I have never yet set to it con amore; one must have some excuse to oneself for laziness, or inability, or both, and this is mine. 'Company, villainous company, has never done me good.' The only thing I have 'drunk medicines,' not to make me love it, but certainly enough to hate myself."

"Two nights ago, I saw the tigers sup at Exeter. 'I cannot know whether they supped on me.'

"—so followed the Arab keeper like a dog,—the fondness of the hyena for her keeper amused me most. Such a conversation! There was a 'hippopotamus,' like Lord Liverpool in the face; and the 'Urso Sibé' hath the very voice and manner of my vole—a test the tiger talked too much. The elephant took and gave me my money again—took off my hat—opened a door—truncked a whip—and behaved, the devil!—equally to the last, as well with the 'as' and with Antony. After doing all she can to persuade him that—but why do they abuse him for cutting off that portly Cicero's head? Did Tully tell Brutus it was a pity to have spared Antony? and did he not speak the Philippics? and are not 'words things?' and such 'words' very pestilent 'things' too? If he had had a hundred heads, they deserved (from Antony) a rostrum (his was stuck up there) a piece—though, after all, he might have as well have pardoned him, for the credit of the thing. But to resume—Cleopatra, after securing him, says, 'yet go'—'it is your interest,' &c., 'how like the sex!' and the questions amount to that in all.

"To-day received Lord Jersey's invitation to Milddon—to travel sixty miles to meet Madame de Staël! I once travelled three thousand to get among the savages; and now, I write octavos and talki s. I have read her books—like most of them, and delight in the last: so I won't hear it, as well as read."

"Read Burns to-day. What would he have been, if a patriot? We should have had more polish—less force—just as much verse, but no immortality— a divorce and a duel or two, the which had he survived, as his potatoes must have been less spirited, he might have lived as long a hereditary Duke, and outlived as much as poor Brinsley. What a week is that man! and all from bad pilottage; for no one had ever better gales, though now and again a little to squally. Poor dear Sherry! I shall never forget the day he, and Rogers, and Moore, and I passed together; when he talked, and we listened, without one yawning, from six till one in the morning."

"Got my seals. I have again forgot a play. I must have ma petite cousine. I was sad for it to-morrow. I hope Harry will bring her to me. I sent Lord Holland the proofs of the last 'Glori,' and the 'Bride of Abyss.' He won't like them. I should not much like them either. It was written in four nights to distract my dreams from. Were it not thus, it had never been composed; and had I not done something at that time, I must have gone mad, by eating my own heart—bitter! H-dgson likes it bet er than the Glori, but nubdy else will,—and he never liked the Fragment. I am sure, had it not been for Murray, that would never have been published, though the circumstances which are the groundwork make it."

"To-night I saw both the sisters of ; my God; the youngest so like! I thought I should have sprung across the house, and am so glad no one was with me in Lady Holland's box. I hate those likeness—these likeness: they look so like as to remind, so different as to be painful. One quarrels equally with the points of resemblance and of distinction.

"No letter from ; but I must not complain. The respectable Job says, 'Why should a living man complain?' I really don't know, except it be that a dead man can't; and he, the said patriarch, did complain, nevertheless, till his friends were tired, and his wife recommended that pious prologue, 'Curse—and die;' the only time, I suppose, when but little relief is to be found in swearing. I have had a meeting of the 'Bride of Abyss,' which he likes, and so does Lady H. This is very good-natured in both, from whom I don't deserve any quarter. Yet I did think, at the time, that my cause of enmity proceeded from Holland House, and am glad I was wrong. I wish I had not been in such a hurry with that confounded satire, of which I would suppress even the memory;—but people, now they can't get it, make a fuss, I verily believe out of contraction.

"George Ellis and Murray have been talking something about Scott and me, George pro Scoito, and very right too. If they want to depose him, I only wish they would not set me up as a competitor. Even if I had any choice, I would rather be the earl of Warwick than all the kings he ever made! Jeffrey and Gifford I take to be the monarch-makers in poetry and prose. The British Critic, in their Rokeby Review, have presupposed a comparison, which I am sure my friends never thought of, and W. Scott's subjects are injudicious in descending to. I like the man—and admire his works to what Mr. Braham calls easewayness. All such stuff can only vex him, and do me no good. Many hate his politics,—(I hate all politics;) and, here, a man's politics are like the Greek soul—an etoiko, besides God knows what other soul; but their estimate of the two general is not together.

"Harry has not brought ma petite cousine. I want us to go to the play together; she has been but once. Another short note from Jersey, inviting Rogers and me on the 23d. I must see my agent to night. I wonder when that Neustead business will be finished. It cost me more than words to part with it—and to have parted with it! What matters it what I do? or what becomes of me?—but let me remember Job's saying, and consoule myself with being 'a living man.'

"I wish I could settle to reading again; my life is monotonous, and yet desultory. I take up books, and fling them down again. I began a comedy, and burned it because the scene ran into reality; a novel, for the same reason. In rhyme, I can keep more away from facts; but the thought always runs through, through, through,—yes, yes, through. I have had a letter from Lady Melbourne, the best friend I ever had in my life, and the cleverest of women."

"Not a word from . Have they set out from  or has my last precious epistle fallen into the lion's jaws? Since they have not answered me, I am suspicious—I must clap on 'my musty morion' and hold out my iron.' I am out of practice, but I won't begin again at Manton's now. Besides, I liked these things; it could not much avail me, if I had lost my wafe-splitter; but then the bullies of society made it necessary. Ever since I began to feel that I had a bad cause to support, I have left off the exercise.

"What strange tidings from that Anakim?
EXTRACTS FROM A JOURNAL.

anybody—Bonaparte! Ever since I defended my boss of him at Harrow against the rashly time-servers, when the war broke out in 1803, he has been a 'Hérao de Roman' of mine, on the continent; I don't want him here. But I don't like these sudden flights, leaving of armies, etc., &c. &c. I am sure when he fought for his bust he had not thought he would run away from himself. But I should not wonder if he banged them yet. To be beat by men would be something; but by three stupid, legitimate-octogenarian sovereigns—O-hone-a-rie!—O-hone-a-rie! It is, as Cobett says, his marriage with the thick-lipped and thick-headed Autrichienne brood. He had been offered me out of Barrow; I never knew any good to come of your young wife, and legal espousals, to any but your 'sober-blooded boy,' who 'eats fish & drinketh 'no sack.' Had he not the whole opera? all Paris? all France? But a mistress is just as perplexing—that is, one,—two or more are manageable by division.

'I have begun, or had begun a song, and flung it into the fire. It was in remembrance of Mary Duff, my first love, before, most people begin to burn. A wonder what lover with her will do to me? I can do nothing, and fortunately there is nothing to do. It has lately been in my power to make two persons (and their connexions) comfortable; and my heart is cool by abstract feeling it. I shall rejoice in the last particularly, as it is an excellent man. I wish there had been more inconvenience and less gratification, to my self-love in it, for then there had been more merit. We are all selfish—and I believe, ye gods, of Epicurean! I believe in RocheFoescouault above men, and in Lucertin, (not Busby's translation,) about yourselves. Your bard has made you very nonchalant and blest; but as he has continued to pay me, thou dost not every year your blessedness much—a little, to be sure. I remem-ber last year, * * * said me at * * * 'Have we not passed our last month like the gods of Lucre-tius?' And so we had. She is an adept in the text of the original, (which I like too,) and when that booby Bus. sent his translating prospectus, she subscribed. But, the devil prompting him to add a specimen, she transmitted him a subsequent answer, saying, that, after perusing it, he himself would not permit her to allow her name to remain on the list of subscribers. * * * *

Last night, at Lord Holland's—Mackintosh, the Ossalstones, Puyeszue, &c., &c., there—I was trying to recollect (as I think) of Stael's, from some Teutonic sophist about architecture. 'Architecture,' says this Macaronica Tedesco, 'reminds me of frozen music.' It is somewhere—but where?—the demon of perplexity must know and won't tell. I asked Moore, and he said it was not in her; but P—* * * said it must be hers; it was so like. * * * * If I laughed, as does still 'De l'Allemagne,—in which, however, I think he goes a little too far. B. I hear, contains it too. But there are fine passages;—and after all, what is a work—any or every work—but a desert with fountains, grove or two, every day's journey? To be sure, in Madame, what we often mistake, and 'pant for,' as the 'cooling stream,' turns out to be the 'mirage,' (critice, verblage;) but we do, at last, get to something like the temple of Jove Ammon, and then the water we have passed is only remembered to gladden the contrast.

"Called on C * * *, to explain * * * * * . She is very beautiful, to my taste, at least; for on coming home from abroad, I recollect being unable to look at any woman but her—they were so fair, and unmeaning, and bloudre. The darkness and regularity of my eye was not a little dammed at Aden.' But this impression wore off; and now I can look at a fair woman without longing for a..."

"Ward—I like Ward." By Mahomet! I begin to think that I like every body; a disposition not to be encouraged; a sort of social gulltiness, that swallows every thing that is before it. But if you will persist in thinking me a +nigmatic +and in my opinion, will stand very high in the House and every where—if he applies regularly. By-the-by, I dine, with him to-morrow which may have some influence on my opinion. It is suitable well not to trust too much after that her. I have heard many a host libelled by his guests, with his burgundy yet reeking on their rascally lips.

"I have taken Lord Salisbury's box at Covent Garden for the season:—and now I must go and prepare to join Lady Holland and party, in theirs, at Drury Lane, quasi sors."

"Holland doesn't think the man is Junius; but that the yet unpublished journal throws great light on the obscurities of that part of George the Second's reign. What is this to George the Third's? I don't know what to think. Why should Junius be yet dead? If suddenly apoplectic, would be rest in his grave without sending his studies to shunt in the cares of posterity, 'Junius was X, X, Z., Esq., buried in the parish of —'. Repair his monument, ye church-wards, ye print a new edition of his letters, ye booksellers!' Impossible; the man must be alive, and will never die without the disclosure. I like him; he was a good hater.

"Came home unwell and went to bed, not so sleepy as might be desirable.

Highlands, called ‘Childe Alarique.’ The word ‘sensibility,’ (always my aversion) occurs a thousand times in these essays; and, it seems, is to be an excuse for all kinds of discontent. This young man can know nothing of life; and, if he cherishes the disposition that runs through the ages, will become useless and, perhaps, not even a poet, after all which he seems determined to be. God help him! no one should be a rhymner who could be any thing but. His mind is so vast, it baffles me, as Scott and Moore, and Campbell and Rogers, who might all have been agents and leaders, now mere spectators. For, though they may have other ostensible arocessions, these last are reduced to a second, or even third class, in comparison. His time is away this time among dowagers and unmarried girls. If it advanced any serious affair, it were some excuse; but, with the unmarried, that is a hazardous speculation, and tresomsome enough; and, with the veterans, it is not much worse trying,—unless, perhaps, one in a thousand.

‘If I had any views in this country, they would probably be parliamentary. But I have no ambition; at least, I would not be a member of the non importa. My hopes are limited to the arrangement of my affairs, and settling either in Italy or the East, (rather the last,) and drinking deep of the languages and literature. Past events have moved me, and, I think, I can now do is to make life an amusement, and look on, while others play. After all—even the highest game of crowns and sceptres, what is it? Vide Napoleon’s last twelvemonth. It has quite upset my system of fatalism. I thought, if crushed, he would have fallen, when ‘fractus illa tur orbitus,’ and not have been paraded away to gradual insignificance,—that all this was not a mere jest of the gods, but a prelude to greater and mightier events. I cannot even advance beyond a certain point;—and here we are, retrograding to the dull, stupid, old system,—balance of Europe—poising straws upon kings’ noses, instead of wringing them off! Give me a republic, or a despotism of one, rather than the mixed government of one, two, three. A republic!—look in the history of the Earth—Egypt, Greece, Venice, France, Holland, America, our short (check!) commonwealth, and compare it with what they did under masters. The Asiatics are not qualified to be republicans, but they have the liberty of demolishing despotisms,—which is the next thing to it. To be the first man—not the last—of this extent, is not the great ambition of the Aristides,—the leader in talent and truth—is next to the divinity! Franklin, Penn, and, next to these, either Brutus or Cassius—even Mirabeau,—or St. Just. I shall never be any thing, or rather always be nothing. The most I can hope is, that some will say, ‘He might, perhaps, if he would.’

12, Midnight.

‘Here are two confounded proofs from the printer. I have looked at the one, but, for the soul of me, I can’t look over that ‘Giaour’ again,—at least, just now, and at this hour—and yet there is no moon.

War! talks of going to Holland, and we have partly discussed an assemble expedition. It must be in ten days, if at all, if we wish to be in at the revolution. And why not? * is distant, and will be at , still more distant, till spring. No one else, except Augusta and Woodhouse, cares for—no fire—no trammels—anitamuk dunque—se torniamo, bene—non c’h’importa? Old William of Orange talked of dying in the last ditch’ of his dingy country. It is like Trafalgar,—I would not well weather the first. But let us see. I have heard hyenas and jackals in the ruins of Asia; and bull-frogs in the marshes, besides wolves and angry Muselmans. Now, I should like to listen to the shout of a free Dutchman.

‘Alas! Viva! For ever! Hours! Huza! which is the most rational or musical of these eries? Orange Boven, according to the Morning Post.

* Wednesday, July 4.

‘No dreams last night of the dead nor the living—so I am firm as the marble, I stood as the rock—til the last. Ward’s dinner went off well. There was not a disagreeable person there—unless I offended any body, which I am sure I could not by contradiction, for I said little, and opposed nothing. Sharpe (a man of elegant mind, and who has always stuck with the best—Fox, Home Tooke, Windham, Fitzpatrik, and all the agitators of other times and tongues) told us the particulars of his last interview with Windham, a few days before the fatal operation, which sent ‘that gallant spirit to aspire to the skies.’ Windham,—the first in one department of oratory and talent, whose only fault was his reflexion beyond the intellect of half his hearers. Windham, half his life as an active participator in the events of the earth, and one of those who governed nations,—he regretted, and dwelt much on the regret, that ‘he had not entirely devoted himself to literature and science!!!’ His mind certainly would have carried him to eminence there, as elsewhere; but I cannot comprehend what debility of that mind could suggest such a wish. I, who have heard him, cannot regret any thing but that I shall never hear him again. What! would he have been a plodder? a metaphysician?—perhaps a rhymner? a scribbler? Such an exchange must have been suggested by illness. But he is gone, and Time shall not look upon his like again.

‘I am tremendously in arrear with my letters,—except to * *, and to her my thoughts overpower me,—my words never compass them. To Lady Melbourne I write with most pleasure—and her answers, so sensible, so tactique—I never met with half her talent. If she had been a few years younger, what a foil she would have made of mine, had she thought it worth her while,—and I should have lost a valuable and most agreeable friend. Mem.—a mistress never is nor can be a friend. While you agree, you are lovers; and, when it is over, any thing but friends.

I have not answered W. Scott’s last letter,—but I will. I regret to hear from others that he has lately been unfortunate in pecuniary involvements. He is undoubtedly the monarch of Parnassus, and the most English of bardz. I should place Rogers next in the living list—(if value be held much more as the last of the best school)—Moore and Campbell both third—Southey, and Wordsworth, and Coleridge the rest, &c &c—thus:

W. SCOTT.

THE MANY.

There is a triangular ‘Gradsus ad Parnassum!’ The names are too numerous for the base of the triangle. Poor Thurlow has gone wild about the poetry of Queen Bess’s reign—‘est donnage. I have ranked the names upon my triangle more upon what I be—
BYRON'S WORKS

...a few popular opinion than any decided opinion of my own. For, to me, some of Moore's last Erins sparkles - 'As a beam o'er the face of the waters' - 'Oh breathe not his name' - are worth all the Epics that ever were composed.

...thinks the Quarterly will attack me next. Let me be 'peppered so highly' in my time, that it is generally agreed I was the most mandible of all the age that we have, and which young, I did also. 'One gets tired of every thing, my angel,' says Valmont. The 'angels' are the only things of which I am not a little sick - but I do think the prevalence of writers to agitate - the mighty stir made about scribbling and scribes, by themselves and others - a sign of clemency, degeneracy, and weakness. Who would write, who had any thing better to do? 'Action' - 'action' - said Demosthenes: 'Actions, actions,' I say, and not writing, - least of all rhyme.

Look at the querulous and monotonous lives of the 'genius' - except Cervantes, Tasso, Dante, Ariosto, (and a few of the French, who are the cunning lovers of the citadels,) Eschylus, Sophocles, and some other of the antiques also - what a worthless, idle brood it is!

Just returned from dinner with Jackson (the emperor of pupilgism) and another of the select, at Cribb's the champion. I drank more than I like, and have brought away some three bottles of very fair claret - for I have no headache. We had Tim Cribb up after dinner - very facetious, though somewhat prolix. He doesn't like his situation - wants to fight again - pray Pollux (or Castor, if he is the Miller) he may! Tom has been a sailor - a cool-headed young and championed professional one before he took to the eustis. Tom has been in action at sea, and is now only three-and-thirty. A great man! I have a wife and a mistress, and conversations well - bating some sad omitted and misapplications of the asperate. Tim is an old friend of mine; I have seen some of his best battles in my nanage. He is now a publican, and I fear, a sinner; - for Mrs.  is on alimony, and 's daughter married on the championed professions the day before he took to the eustis. Tom had an opinion of my morals, passed her off as a legal spouse. Talking of her, he said, 'she was the truth of women' - from which I immediately inferred she could not be his wife, and so it turned out.

These panegyrics don't belong to matrimoniy for if 'true,' a man don't think it necessary to say so; and if not, the less he says the better.

...is the only man, except . I have heard harangue upon his wife's virtue; and I listened to both with great credence and patience, and stufied my headcheif into my mouth, when I found yawning irresistible. By-the-by, I am yawnning now so, - good-night to thee, N - o - p - o - p - o - p - o - p - o. Thursday, 26th November.

Awake a little feverish, but no headache - no dreams neither - thanks to supper! Two letters, one from  of the Melbourne Lady Melbourne - both excellent in their respective styles. 's contained also a very pretty lyric on 'concealed griefs' - 'if not her own, yet very like her. Why did I take the liberty' - etc. - or were not of her composition? - I do not know whether to wish them hers or not. I have no great esteem for poetical persons, particularly women - they have so much of the mirth, and so little of the grave, as ethics. - My mother is - my sister is - always to rally me about this childish amour; and, at last, many years after, when I was sixty she told me one day, 'Oh, Byron, I have had a letter from Edinburgh, from Miss Abercomby, and your old sweetheart, Miss Duff is married to a Mr. Coe.' And what was my answer? I really can't explain or account for my feelings at that moment; but they nearly threw me into convulsions, and alarmed my mother so much, that, after I grew better, she has been seen to sitting at the soirée very silent, and to herself with telling it to all her acquaintance. Now, what could this be? I had never seen her since her mother's faux-pas at Aberdeen had made her a subject of mockery, and sent her down to Banff: we were both the merest children. I had and have been attached fifty times since that period; yet I recollect all we said to each other, all our cresses, her features, my restlessness, sleeplessness, my tormenting my mother's maid to write for me to her, which she at last did, to quiet me. Poor Nancy I thought I was wild, and, as I could not write for myself, became my secretary. I remember, too, our walks, and the happiness of sitting by Mary, in the children's apartment, at their house not far from the Plainstones at Aberdeen, while her less sister Helen played with the doll, and we sat gravely looking at it and talking.

'How the deuce did all this occur so early? where could it originate? I certainly had no sexual ideas for years afterward; and yet my misery, my love for that girl were so violent, that I sometimes doubted if I had not been really a beholder of that that it may, hearing of her marriage several years after, was like a thunder-stroke - it nearly choked me - to the horror of my mother and the astonishment of her and almost every body. And it is a phenomenon in my existence (for I was not eight years old) which has puzzled, and will puzzle me, to the latest hour of it; and lately, I know not why, the recollection (not the attachment) has returned as gravely as ever. I wonder if she can have the least remembrance of it or me? or remem her pitying sister Helen for having an ad mirer too? How very pretty is the perfect image of her in my memory - her brown dark hair, and hazel eyes - her very dress! I should be quite grieved to see her now; the reality, however beautiful, would destroy, or at least confuse, the features of the lovely Peri which then existed in her, and still lives in my imagination at a distance of more than sixteen years. I am now twenty-five and old months.....

'I think my mother told the circumstances (on her hearing of her marriage) to her friends, and certainly to the Pigot family, and probably men tioned it in her answer to Miss A., who was well acquainted with my childish penchant, and had sent the news on purpose for me, - and, thanks to her!'

'Next to the beginning, the conclusion has often occupied my reflections, in the way of investigation. That the facts are thus, others know as well as I, and my memory yet tells me so, in more than a whisper. But, the more I recite, the more I am bewildered to assign any cause for this precocious affection.'

'Lord Holland invited me to dinner to-day; but three days' fasting would destroy me. So, without eating at all since yesterday, I went to my box at Covent Garden.'

'Saw  looking very pretty, though quite different style of beautiful from the other - the other has the finest eyes in the world, out of which she pretends not to see, and the longest eyelashes I ever saw, since Leila's and Phannio's Moslem curtains of the light. She has my beauty - just enough - but I think, mechante.'
tion than no mental or personal estrangement, from ennui or disagreement, can take place—and when people meet hereafter, even though many changes may have taken place in the mean time, still—unless they are tired of each other—they are ready to reunite, and not to other for the circumstances that severed them.

"Saturday, 27th, (I believe—it may be am double, which is the less sublime of mental truth.)"

"I have missed a day; and, as the Irishman said, or Joe Miller says for him, 'have gained a loss,' or by the loss. Everything is settled for Holland, and nothing but a cough, or a caprice of my fellow-travellers, can stop me. Carriages ordered—funds prepared—and, probably, a gale of wind to the bargain. N. importe—I believe, with Clyn o the Clew, or Robin Hood, 'By our Mary (dear name!) that art both Mother and May, I think it ever was a man's lot to die before his day.' Heigh for Helvoetsluis, and so forth!"

"To-night I went with young Henry Fox to see 'Nourjahad—a drama, which the Morning Post is pleased to censure.' I hear, as for can next week, that Carritte ordere

"Sunday, I dined with Lord Holland in St. James's Square. Large party—among them Sir S. Romney and Lady Ry;— General Sir Somebody (I think the son of the late Lord—), Horner—The Horner, an Edinburgh Reviewer, an excellent speaker in the 'Honorable House,' very pleasing, and gentlemanly in company, as far as I can judge. Lord John Russell, and others, I need not true. Holland's society is very good; you always see some one or other in it worth knowing. Stuffed myself with sturgeon, and exceeded in champagne and wine in a manner, but no ventilation of heart. When I do dine, I gorge like an Arab or a boa

"Why does not one see some other in it worth knowing. Stuffed myself with sturgeon, and exceeded in champagne and wine in a manner, but no ventilation of heart. When I do dine, I gorge like an Arab or a boa, snake, on fish and vegetables, but no meat. I am always better, however, on my tea and biscuit than any other regimen—and even that sparingly."

"Redde the Ed. Review of Rogers. He is ranked highly—but where he should be. There is a summary view of us all—Moore and me among the rank. I hear, it is high in London; and in implication (justly again) placed beneath our memorable friend. Mackintosh is the writer, and also of the critic on the Star. His grand essay on Byron is one of the things that have firmly established his name. Nothing of the Edinburgh, or of any other Review, but from rumor; and have long ceased—indeed, I could not, in justice, complain of any, even though I were to rate poetry in general, and my rhymes in particular, more highly than I really do. To withdraw myself from myself (oh that cursed selfishness!) has ever been my sole, my entire, my sincere motive in scribbling at all; and publishing is also the continuance of the same object. The reputation which it affords to the mind, which else recouls upon itself, if I valued fame, I should have rejected opinions, which have gathered strength by time, and will yet be more lasting than any living works to the contrary. For, to some, the mind will not give the lie to my own thoughts and doubts, come what may. If I am a fool, it is, at least, a doubting one; and I envy no one the certainty of his self-assertion."

"All are inclined to believe what they covet, from a lottery-ticket up to a passport to Paradise; in which, from description, I see nothing very tempting; or restlessness tells me the laws have something within that 'passet show.' It is for Him who made it, to prolong that spark of celestial fire which illuminates, yet burns, this frail tenement; but I see no such horror in a 'dreamless sleep' and..."

back) on Ward, who was asking 'how much it would take to re-whig him?' I answered that, probably, he must first, before he was re-whigged, be re-warried! This foolish quibble, before the Stael and Mackintosh and a number of conversations Commissioner Mackintosh has been mouthed about, and at last settled on the head of * * * where long may it remain!

"George" is returned from abroad to get a new ship. He looks thin, but, I am not expected. I like George much more than most people like their heirs. He is a fine fellow, and every inch a sailor. I w.uld do any thing, but apostatize, to get him on in his profession.

Lewis is called. It is a good and good-humored man, but pestilently profic, and paradoxical, and personal. If he would but talk half, and reduce his visits in an hour he would add to his popularity. As an author, he is very good, and his vanity is...er. Like Erskine's, and yet not offending.

"Yesterday, a very pretty letter from Annabella,* which I answered. What an odd situation and friendship is ours! without one spark of love on either side produced by circumstances which in general lead in coldness to one side, and aversion on the other. She is a very superior woman, and very little spoiled, which is strange in an heiress—a great fault, as I see to the right—an only child, and a savante, who has always had her own way. She is a poetess—a mathematician—a metaphysician; and yet, withal, very kind, generous, and simple.

Any other head would be turned with half her acquisitions, and a tenth of her advantages.

"To-day responded to La Baronne de Staël Holstein, and sent to Leigh Hunt (an acquisition to my acquaintance)—through Moore—of last summer a copy of the two Turkish tales. Hunt is an extraordinary character and not exactly of the present age. He reminds me more of the Pym and Hampden times—much talent, great independence of spirit, and an austere, yet not repulsive, aspect. If he goes on with his ab incepto, I know few men who will deserve more praise or obtain it. I must go and see him again; the rapid succession of adventure since last summer, added to some serious meanness and business, have interrupted our acquaintance; but he is a man worth knowing; and though, for a man of his age, he is nearly at the reading, I, like some study character in such situations. He has been unshaken, and will continue so. I don't think him deeply versed in life; he is the bigot of virtue, (sit'a) and he is as he appears; a Business, that empty name, as the last breath of Brutus pronounced, and every day proves it. He is, perhaps, a little opinionated, as all men who are the centre of circles, wide or narrow—the Sir Ocales, in whose name two or three are gathered together—must be, and as even Johnson was; but, withal, a valuable man, and less vain than success and even the consciousness of preferring the right to the expedi-tent might excuse.

\[\text{The Bride of Abydos was published on Thursday the second of December, but how it is liked or disliked, I know not. Whether it succeeds or not is no fault of the public, against whom I can have no complaint. But I am much more indebted to the public for its sale, than to the particular reader; as it wrung my thoughts from reality to imagination—from selfish regrets to vivid recollections—and recalled me to a country replete with the brightest and darkest, but always most lively colors of my memory. \[\text{Murray tells me that Croker asked him why the thing was called the Bride of Abydos. It is a cursed awkward question, being unanswerable. She is not a bride, only about to be one; but for, &c., &c.}

\[\text{I don’t wonder at his finding out the bull; but the detection } \ast \ast \text{ is too late to do any good. I was a great fool to make it, and am ashamed of not being an Irishman.}

\[\text{Campbell last night seemed a little nettled at something or other—I know not what. We were standing in the ante-saloon, when Lord H. brought out of the other room a vessel of some composition similar to that which is used in Catholic churches, and, seeing us, he exclaimed, ‘Here is some venena for you.’ Campbell answered—‘Carry it to Lord Byron;—he is used to it.’}

\[\text{Now, this companion ‘bearing no brother near the throne.’ I, who have no throne, nor wish to have one now—whatever I may have done—aam at perfect peace with all the poetical fraternity;—or, at least, if I dislike any, it is not poetically, but personally. Surely, the field of thought is infinite;—what does it signify who is before or behind in a race where there is no goal? The temple of Fame is like that of the Persians, the Universe;—our altar, the tops of the mountains and the unsaturated regions of Mount Caucas or Mount Anything; and those who like it may have Mount Blanc or Chimboraz, without my envy of their elevation.}

\[\text{I think I may now speak thus; for I have just published a poem, and am quite ignorant whether it is likely to be liked or not. I have hitherto heard little in its commendation, and no one can downright abuse it to one’s face, except in print. But I begun it with heart full of } \ast \ast \text{, and my head of orientialities, (I can’t call them iams,) and wrote on rapidly.}

\[\text{This journal is a relief. When I am tire—I as generally am—out comes this, and down goes everything. But I can’t read it over; and God knows what contradictions it contain. If I am sincere and I mean to do it, as I think I do, I don’t refer to any else, (not even to more or less than to any one else,) every page should confute, refute, and utterly abjure its predecessor.}

\[\text{Another scribble from Martin Baldwin the pettioner: I have neither head nor nerves to present that contention at that proper age of it. Lewis has spoiled my digestion and my philanthropy. I have no more charity than a crust of vinegar. Would I were an ostrich, and died of fire-irons—or any thing that my pizzazz could not take up.}

"Much done, but nothing to record. It is quite enough to set down my thoughts; my actions will rarely bear retrospect." —Dec. 17, 18—

"Lord Holland told me a curious piece of sentimentiality in Sheridan. The other night we were all delivering our respective and various opinions on him and other homines maruyans, and mine was to say, 'Whatever Sheridan has done or chosen to do, has been, par excellence, always the best of its kind. He has written the best comedy, (School for Scandal,) the best drama, (in my mind, far before that St. Giles's,) the greatest ballad, (The Beggar's Opera,) the best farce, (the Critic—it is only too good for a farce,) and the best address, (Monologue on Garrick,) and to crown all, delivered the very best oration (the famous Begum Speech) ever conceived or heard in this country.' Somebody told S. this the next day, and on hearing it, he burst into tears!" —Dec. 17, 18—

I went to the box at Covent Garden to-night; and my delirious felt a little shocked at seeing the * * *'s mistress (who, to my certain knowledge, was actually educated, from her birth, for her profession) sitting with her mother, "the three-piled sod, b — d — Major to the army," in a private box opposite. I felt rather indignant; but, casting my eyes round the house, in the next box to me, and the next, and the next, were the most distinguished and young Babylonians of quality; —so I burst out a laughing. It was really odd; Lady * * * divorced—Lady * * * and her daughter, Lady * * *, both disrespectful—Mrs. * * * in the next, the like, and still newer * * * * * * What an assemblage to me, who know all their histories. It was as if the house had been divided between your public and your understood courtiers; but the intrigantes much outnumbered the regular mercenaries. On the other side were only Pauline and her mother, and next box to her, three of inferior note. Now, where lay the difference between her and mamma, and Lady * * * and her mother? Sir last may enter Carleton and any other house, and the two first are limited to the opera and b—house. How I do delight in observing life as it really is! and myself, after all, the worst of any. But, no matter, we must avoid egotism, which, just now, would be no vanity."

"I have lately written a wild, rambling, unfinished rhapsody, called 'The Devil's Drive,' the notion of which I took from Porson's 'Devil's Walk.'"

"Rede some Italian, and wrote two sonnets on * * * * * I never wrote but one sonnet before, and that was not in earnest, and many years ago, as an exercise—and I will never write another, as they are the most piling, petrifying, stupidly platonic compositions. I detest the Petrarch so much, that I would not be the man even to have obtained his Laura, which the metaphysical, whining dotard never would." —Dec. 17, 18—

"To-morrow I leave town for a few days. I saw Lewis to-day, who has just returned from Oatlands where he has been squabbling with Mr. M. He talked a deal about himself, Clarissa Harlowe, Mackintosh, and..."
BYRON'S WORKS.

My homage has never been paid in that quarter, or we would have agreed still worse. I don't talk, I can't write, and won't listen, except to a pretty or foolish woman. She boded Lewis with praises of herself till he sickened—found out that Clariissa was perfection, and Mackintosh the first match, in such a case, least one ever got; and, first, but Lewis did not. As to Clariissa, I leave to those who can read it to judge and dispute. I could not do the one, and am, consequently, not qualified for the other. She told Lewis wisely, he being my friend, that it was affected in the first place; and that, in the next place, I committed the heinous offence of sitting at dinner with my eyes shut, or half shut. I wonder if I really have to. It can't be. It must be a trick. One insensibly acquires awkward habits, which should be broken in time. If this is one, I wish I had been told of it before. It would not so much signify if one was always to be checkmated by a plain woman, but one may as well see some of one's neighbors, as well as the plate upon the table.

"I should like, of all things, to have heard the Amaboan clogge between her and Lewis,—both obsession and curtailing shrill. In fact, one could have heard nothing else. But they fell out, alas!—and now they will never quarrel again. Could one not reconcile them for the nonce?"—Poor Corinoco, she will find that some of her fine sayings not suit our fine ladies and gentlemen.

"I am getting rather into admiration of , the youngest sister of . A wife would be my salvation. I am sure the wives of my acquaintance have hitherto done me little good.  is beautiful, but very young, and, I think, a fool. But I have not seen enough to judge; besides, I hate an excess in poetry, and he has an excess. It may be, it is very probable, or not. I should love her. But on my system, and the modern system in general, don't sighify. The business (if it came to business) would probably be arranged between papa and me. She would have her own way; I am good-humored to women, and docile; and, if I did not fall in love with her, which I should try to prevent, we should be a very comfortable couple. As to conduct, that she must look to. I am not the type of a stock, nor will I be the type of a stock for that reason I will not be in love. Though, after all, I doubt my temper, and fear I should not be so patient as becomes the benevolence of a4 amused man in my station. . Divorce is the modern escape; and damages are a paltry compensation. I do fear my temper would lead me into some of our oriental tricks of vengeance, or, at any rate, into a summation appeal to the court of twelve places. So 'I'll none on,' or it, if I remain, single and solitary; though I should like to have somebody, now and then, to yawn with one.

"Ward, and, after him, , has stolen one of my buffoneries about Mule, de Staël's Metaphysics and the Fog, and passed it by, speech and letter, as their own. As Gibbet says, 'they are the most of a gentleman of any on the road.' W. is in sad enemy with the whigs about this review of Fox, (if he did review him;)—all the epigrammatists and essayists are at him. I hate odds, and wish he may beat them. As for me, by the blessing of indifference, I have simplified my politics into an utter delirium, and have continued to exist; and, whom is the shortest and most agreeable and summary feeling imaginable, the first moment of a universal republic would convert me into an advocate for single and simple lives. The fact is, riches are power, and poverty is slavery, all over the earth, and one sort of establishment is no better, nor worse, for a people than another. I shall adhere to my party, because it would not be honorable to lose it. It is not to be won. We can't think politics worth an opinion. Conduct is another thing—if you begin with a party, go on with them. I have no consistency, except in politics, and that probably arises from my indifference on the subject altogether.

"Better than a month since I last journalized:—most of it out of London, and at Notts., but a busy one and a pleasant, at least three weeks of it. On my return, I am in a London garb, but the town in an uproar, on the awaval and repub- licaion of two stanzas on Princess Charlotte's weeping at Regency's speech to Lauderdale in 1812. They are daily at it still; some of the abuse good, all of it hearty. They talk of a motion in our House upon it—it be so.

"Got up—read the Morning Post containing the battle of Bonaparte, the destruction of the Custermhouse, and many other topics on one as long as my pencil, and versitave, as usual.

"Hobhouse is returned to England. He is my best friend, the most lively, and a man of the most. sterling talents extant.

"'The Corsair' has been conceived, written, published, &c., since I last took up this journal. They tell me it has great success;—it was written con amore, and much from existence. Murray is satisfied with its progress; and the public are equally so with the perusal, there's an end of the matter.

"'The Dibdab.'

"Been to Hanover on business. Saw Rogers and had a note from Lady Melbourne, who says, 'it is said that I am much out of spirits.' I wonder if really am or not? I have certainly enough of that perilous stuff which weighs upon the heart, and it is better they should believe it to be the result of these attacks than of the real cause; but, ay, always but, to the end of the chapter.

"Hobhouse has told me ten thousand anecdotes of Napoleon, all good and true. My friend H. is the most entertaining of companions, and a fine fellow to boot.

"Redde a little—wrote notes and letters, and am alone, which, Locke says, is bad company. 'Be not solitary, be not idle!'—'Endlessness is troublesome; but I can't see so much to regret in the solitude. The more I see of men, the less I like them. If I could but say so of women, too, all would be well. Why can't I? I am now six-and-twenty, my passions have had enough to cool them: my affections more than enough to wither them,—and yet—and yet—always but—Excellent well, you are a fishmonger—get thee to a nursery. 'They fool me to the top of my bent.'—Midnight.

"Began a letter, which I threw into the fire. Redde—but to little purpose. Did not visit Hobhouse, as I promised and ought. No matter, the loss is mine. Smoked cigars.

"Napoleon!—this week will decide his fate. All seems against him; but I believe and hope he will win—least, beat back the invaders. What right have we to prescribe sovereignty to France? Oh for a republic! 'Brutus, thou sleepest.' Hobhouse abounds in continental anecdotes of this extraordinary man; all in favor of his intellect and courage, but against his bonhomme. No wonder;—how should he, who knows mankind well, do other than despise and abhor them.

"The greater the equality, the more impartially evil is distributed, and becomes lighter by the divi- sion among so many—therefore, a republic!

"More notes from Mad. de Staël unanswered—and so they shall remain. I admire her abilities, but really can't think much of her. The fact is, riches are power, and poverty is slavery, all over the earth, and one sort of establishment is no better, nor worse, for a people than another. I shall adhere to my party, because it would not be honorable to lose it. It is not to be won. We can't think politics worth an opinion. Conduct is another thing—if you begin with a party, go on with them. I have no consistency, except in politics, and that probably arises from my indifference on the subject altogether."

such a world; for what purpose dandies, for instance, were ordained—and kings—and fellows of colleges—and women of a certain age—and many men of any age—and myself, most of all!

"I am a solitary goblin,—a solitary hobgoblin. True;—I am myself alone. The last week has been passed in reading—seeing plays—now and then, visitors—sometimes yawnings and sometimes sighings, but no writing—saving of letters. If I could always read, I should never feel the want of society. Do I regret it?—am Man delights not me, and only one woman—at a time.

"There is something to me very softening in the presence of a woman,—some strange influence, even if one is not in love with them,—which I cannot at all account for, having no very high opinion of the sex. But yet,—I always feel in better humor with myself and every thing else, if there is a woman within ken. Even Mrs. Mule, my fire-lighted,—the most ancient and withered of her kind and (except to myself) not the best tempered,—always makes me laugh,—no difficult task when I am 'I the vein.'

"Heigho! I would I were in mine island!—I am not well, and yet I look in good health. At times, indeed, I fear, 'I am in a very periphrastic scene.' I am not sorry that my heart and head have stood many a crash, and what should all them now? They prey upon themselves, and I am sick—sick—Prithee, undo this button; why should a cat, a rat, a dog, have life, and thou no life at all? Six-and-twenty years, as they call them—why, I might and should have been a Pasha by this time. 'I gin to be a weary of the sun.'

"Bonaparte I do not yet beaten; but I reported Blucher, and repaired Swartzeed; this is to have a head. If he again wins, 'Vie victis'!

"I think that I had a talent for the drama; I would write a tragedy now. But no,—it is gone.—Hogdon talks of one,—he will do it well;—and I think Mr. McCre should try. H has wonderful powers, and much variety; besides, he has lived and felt. To write so as to bring home to the heart, the heart must have been tried,—but, perhaps, ceased to be so. While you are under the influence of passions, I have only felt, but cannot describe them,—very much; in action, you could turn round, and tell the story to your next neighbor! When all is over,—all, all irrevocable,—trust to memory,—she has left me then but too faithful.

"Went out, and answered some letters, yawned now and then, and rode the Robbers. Fine,—but Penn is better; and a Merit and Monti's Aristides is not the least. They are more equal than the Tedeschi dramatists.

"Answered,—or, rather, acknowledged—the receipt of young Flora's letter. The lady is clever, but much of his thoughts are borrowed, whence, the Reviewers may find out. I hate discouraging a young one; and I think,—though wild, and more oriental than he would be, had he seen the scenario in all its splendor,—that he has much talent and certainly fire enough.

"Received a very singular epistle,—and the mode of its conveyance, through Lord H.'s, where I had no written, but not inclined to go any where. Hothouse says I am growing a long garnet,—a solitary hobgoblin. True;—I am myself alone.' The last week has been passed in reading—seeing plays—now and then, visitors—sometimes yawnings and sometimes sighings, but no writing—saving of letters. If I could always read, I should never feel the want of society. Do I regret it?—am Man delights not me, and only one woman—at a time.

"There is something to me very softening in the presence of a woman,—some strange influence, even if one is not in love with them,—which I cannot at all account for, having no very high opinion of the sex. But yet,—I always feel in better humor with myself and every thing else, if there is a woman within ken. Even Mrs. Mule, my fire-lighted,—the most ancient and withered of her kind and (except to myself) not the best tempered,—always makes me laugh,—no difficult task when I am 'I the vein.'

"Heigho! I would I were in mine island!—I am not well, and yet I look in good health. At times, indeed, I fear, 'I am in a very periphrastic scene.' I am not sorry that my heart and head have stood many a crash, and what should all them now? They prey upon themselves, and I am sick—sick—Prithee, undo this button; why should a cat, a rat, a dog, have life, and thou no life at all? Six-and-twenty years, as they call them—why, I might and should have been a Pasha by this time. 'I gin to be a weary of the sun.'

"On Tuesday last dined with Rogers,—Madame de Stael, Mackintosh, Sheridan, Erskine, and Payne Knight, Lady Donegall and Miss R. there. Sheridan told a very good story of himself and Mr. Reynolds's quizzing Lord Beccarav's French chef. Erskine's few stories of himself only. She is going to write a big book about England, she says,—I believe her. Asked by her how I liked Miss * * *'s thing, called * * * and answered (very sincerely) that I thought it very bad for her, and worse than any of the others. Afterward thought it possible Lady Donegall being Irish, might be a patroness of * * *, and was rather sorry for my opinion, as I hate putting people into fuses, either with themselves, or their favorites; it looks as if one did it on purpose. The party went off very well, and the fish was very much to my gusto. But we got up too soon after the women; and Mrs. Corinne always lingers so long after dinner, that we wish her in—the drawing-room.

"To-day C. called, and, while sitting here, I saw Sir Merivale. During our colloquy, C. (ignorant that M. was the writer) paused the awkwardness of the Quarterly Review of Grimm's Correspondence. I knewing the secret) changed the conversation as soon as I could; and C. went away, quite convinced of having made the most favorable impression on his new acquaintance. Merivale is luckily a very good-natured fellow, or God knows what might have been engendered from such a malaprop. I did not look at him while this was going on, but I felt like for I like Merivale, as well as the article in question.

"Asked to Lady Keith's to-morrow evening—I think I will go; but it is the first party invitation I have accepted this season,' as the learned Fletcher called it, when that youngest brat of Lady * * *'s cut my eye and check open with a misdirected pet-ble.
'T Never mind, my lord, the scar will be gone before the season; as if one's eye was of no importance in the mean time.
"Lord Erskine called, and gave me his famous pamphlet, with a marginal note and corrections in his handwriting. Sent it to be bound superbly, and shall treasure it.
"Sent most of my fine print of Napoleon to be framed.
It is framed; and the emperor becomes his robes as if he had been hatched in them."

March 7.
"Rose at seven—ready by half-past eight—went to Mr. Horne tooke, where I found Berkeley square, with his eldest daughter, Mary Anne, (a good girl), and gave her away to the Earl of Portsmouth.— Saw her fairly a countess—congratulated the family and groom (bride)—drank a bumper of wine (wholesome sherris) to their felicity, and all that,—and came home. Asked to stay to dinner, but could not.
At three sat to Phillips for faces. Called on Lady M.—I like her so well, that I always stay too long. (Mem.—to mend of that.)

"Passed the evening with Hobhouse, who has began a poem, which promises highly; with he would go on with it. Heard some curious extracts from a life of Morosini, the blundering Venetian, who tried to have passed in piracy. 'tis a fine ship: and be d— to him! Wax'd sleepy,—just come home,—must go to bed, and am engaged to meet Sheridan to-morrow at Roger's.

"A queer ceremony that same of marriage—saw many abroad, Greek and Catholic—one, at home, many years ago. There be some strange phrases in the prologue, (the exhortation,) which made me turn away, not to laugh in the face of the surplice-man. Made one blunder, when I joined the hands of the happy—rammed their left hands, by mistake, into one another. Corrected it—bustled back to the altar-rail, and said 'Amen.' Portsmouth responded as if he had got the whole by heart; and, if any thing, was rather before the priest. It is now midnight, and

March 10, 'Thurs.' Day.
"On Tuesday dined with Rogers—Mackintosh, Sheridan, Sharpe—much talk, and good—all, except my own little prattlement. Much old of times
—Horne Tooke,—the Trials,—evidence of Sheridan, —and anecdotes of those times, when I alas! was an infant. If I had been a man, I would have made a second Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

"Set down Sheridan at Brookes's—where, by-the-by, he could not have well set down himself, as he and I were the only drinkers. Sherry means to stand for Westminster, as Cochrane (the stockjobbing hoaxter) must vacate. Broughtum is a candidate. I fear for poor dear Sherry. Both have talents of the highest order, but the younger has yet a character. We shall see, if he lives to Sherry's age, how he will pass over the red-hot ploughshares of public life. I don't know why, but I hate to see the old ones lose; particularly Sheridan, with standing all his mechanicates.

"Wrote the kindest, thanks from Lady Portsmouth, p:re and mire, for my matchmaking. I don't regret it, as she looks the countess well, and is a very good girl. It is odd how well she carries her new shawl. She looks a different woman, and high-bred, too. I had no idea that I could make so good a peeress.

"Went to the play with Holhouse. Mrs. Jordan superlative in Hoyden, and Jones well enough in Forbes's. 'That play hurry—what idiots!' Helen!
Congreve and Vanbrugh are your only comedy. Our society is too insipid now for the like copy. Would not go to Lady Keith's. Holhouse thought it odd.
I wonder: it should like parties, if it is in love, and wants to break a commandment and covet any thing that is there, they do very well. But to go out among the mere herd, without a motive, pleasure, or pursuit—'scheid! 'T I none of it. He told me an old report; that I am the actual Conrad, the veritable Corsair, and that part of my travels are staged to have passed in piracy. They say sometimes hit the truth; out never the whole truth. H. don't know what I was about the year
'59 he left the Levant; nor does any one—nor—or—nor—however, it is a lie; but, 'I doubt the equivocation of the fiend that lies like truth! '"

"I shall have letters of importance to-morrow.—
Which, * * * or * * *? heigho! —is in my heart, in my head, in my eye, and the single one, heaven knows where! All written and answered. 'Since I have crept in favor with myself, I must maintain it;' but I never 'mistook my person,' though I think others have.

"A card to-day in great despair about his mistress, who has taken a freak of * * *.
He began a letter to her, but was obliged to stop short —finished it for him, and he copied and sent it.—
If he holds out and keeps to my instructions of affected indifference, she will lower her colors.
If she don't, he will, at least, get rid of her, and she don't seem much worth keeping. But the poor lad is in love—and if that is the case, she will win.
When they once discover their power, finita e la musica.

"Sleepy, and must go to bed."

Tuesday, March 15.
"Dined yesterday with R., Mackintosh, and Sharpe. Sheridan could not come. Sharpe told several very amusing anecdotes of Henderson, the author. Stayed till late, and came to my rooms drunk, so much tea, that I did not get to sleep till six this morning. R. says that I am to be in this Quarterly—cut up, I presume, as they 'hate us youth.' 'No!' he says, 'the don't wonder—Conrad is so like.' It is odd that one, who knows me so thoroughly, should tell me this to my face. However, if she don't know, nobody can.

"Mackintosh is, it seems, the writer of the de-defensive letter in the Morning Chronicle. If so, it is very kind, and more than I did for myself.

"W. W. called—Lord Erskine, Lord Helder, &c., &c. Wrote to * * * the Corsair report. She says, she is sure, she don't wonder—'Conrad is so like.' It is odd that one, who knows me so thoroughly, should tell me this to my face. However, if she don't know, nobody can.

"Mackintosh is, it seems, the writer of the de-defensive letter in the Morning Chronicle. If so, it is very kind, and more than I did for myself.

"Told Murray to secure for me Bandello's Italian novels at the sale to-morrow. To me they will be nuts. Redde a satire on myself, called 'Anti-Byron, and told Murray to publish it, if he liked. The object of the author is to prove me an Atheist and a systematic conspirator against law and government.
Some of the parts are good; the whole I don't quite understand. He assert's that my 'delatorious works' have had an 'effect upon civil society, which requires, &c., &c., &,' and his own poetry. It is a lengthy poem and a long preface, with a famous conclude-page. Like the fly in the fable, I seem to have got upon a wheel which makes much dust; but, unlike the said fry, I do not take it all for my own raising.

"A letter from Bella, which I answered. I shall be in love with her again, if I don't take care.

"I shall begin a more regular system of reading soon.

Thursday, March 17.
"I have been sparring with Jackson for exercise this morning; and mean to continue and renew my acquaintance with the muffles. My chest, and arms, and wind are in very good plight, and I am not in flesh. I used to be a hard hitter, and my arms are very long for my height (5 feet 8 1/2 inches). At any rate, exercise is good and this the severest of all; fencing and the broadsword never fatigue me half so much.

"Redde the ‘Quarrels of Authors’ (another sort of sparring)—a new work, by that most entertaining and researchful writer, Israel de Moÿuer, which is an irritable set, and I wish myself well out of it.
I’ll not march through Coventry with them, that’s done. What the devil had I to do with scuffling? It is too late to enquire, and all regret is useless.
But, an’ it were to do again, I should write again,
I suppose. Such is human nature, at least my share of it;—though I shall think better of myself, if I have sense to stop now. If I have a wife, and that wife has a son—by any body—i’ll bring up mine her in the most anti-poetical way—make him a lawyer, or a pirate, or—any thing. But if he writes too, shall I be sure he is none of mine, and cut him off with a bank-token. Must write a letter—three clock.

"Sunday, March 30.

I intended to go to Lady Hardwicke’s, but won’t.
I always begin the day with a bias towards going to parties; but as the evening advances my stimuli fail, and I hang the gates of Macbeth again. I do, always regret it. This might have been a pleasant one;—at least the hostess is a very superior woman. Lady Lansdowne’s to-morrow.—Lady Heath-cote’s Wednesday. Um!—I must spare myself into got none of them; it will look like rudeness, and it is better to do as other people do—confound them!

"Redde Machiavel, parts of Chardin, and Sismondi, and Bandello,—by starts. Redde the Edinburgh Weekly. Just in the morning of the article on ‘Edgeworth’s Patronage,’ I have gotten a high compliment, I perceive. Whether this is creditable to me, I know not; but it does honor to the editor, because he once abused me. Many men will retract praise; none but a high-spirited mind will revoke its censure, or can praise the man it has once attacked. I have often, since my return to England, heard Jeffrey most highly commended by those who know him for things independent of his talents. I admire him for this—not because he has praised me (I have been so praised elsewhere and abused, alternately, that mere habit has rendered the words mere trash as a man at twenty-six can be to any thing), but because in it is perhaps the only man who, under the relations in which he and I stand, or stood, with regard to each other, would have had the liberality to act thus; none but a great soul dared hazard it. The height on which he stands has not made him giddy—i.e., a little scribbler would have gone on cavilling to the end of the chapter. As to the justice of his panegyric, that is matter of taste. There are plenty to question it, and grip, too, of the opportunity.

"Lord Erskine called to-day. He means to carry down his reflections on the war,—or rather wars,—to the present day. I trust that he will. Must send to Mr. Murray for a copy of my copy of his picture finished, as Lord E. has promised me to correct it, and add some marginal notes to it. Any thing in his handwriting will be a treasure, which will gather compound interest from years. Erskine has high expectations of Maitland’s promised history. Undoubtedly it must be a classic, when finished.

"Spared with Jackson again yesterday morning, and felt and seemed in a much better for it, my spirits, though my arms and shoulders are very stiff from it. Mem.—to attend the pugilistic dinner.
Marquis Huntley is in the chair.

"Lord Erskine thinks that ministers must be in peril of going out. So much the better for him.

To me it is the same who are in or out,—we want something more than a change of ministers, and some day we will have it.

"I remember, in riding from Chriasso to Castri (Delphos) along the shore of Peraeus, I saw six eagles in the air. It is uncommon to see so many gether; and it was the number—not the species, which is common enough—that excited my attention.

"The last bird I ever fired at was an eagle, on the shore of the Gulf of Lepanto, near Vositzza.
It was only wounded, and I tried to save it, the eye was so bright; but it pined, and died in a few days; and I never did since, and never will, attempt the death of another bird. I think, these two things into my head just now? I have been reading Sismondi, and there is nothing there that could induce the recollection.

"I am mightily taken with Braccio di Montone, Giovanni Galeazzo, and Eccellino. But the last is not Bracciaferro, (of the same name,) Count of Ravenna, whose history I want to trace. There is a fine engraving in Lavater, from a picture by Fuseli, of that Eccellino, the body is covered with punished by him for a ‘hitch’ in her constancy during his absence in the Crusades. He was right—but I want to know the story.

"Tuesday, March 31.

Last night, party at Lansdowne House. To night, party at Lady Charlotte Greville’s—deplorable waste of time, and something of temper. Nothing improper—nothing acquired—talking without ideas—if any thing like thought in my mind, it was not on the subjects on which we were gabbling Heigho!—and in this way half London pass what is called life. Themorning there is Lady Heathcote’s—shall I go? yes—to punish myself for not having a pursuit.

"Let me see—what did I see? The only person who much struck me was Lady S’s & d’s eldest daughter, Lady C. L. They say she is not pretty.
I don’t know—every thing is pretty that pleases;
but there is an air of soul about her—and her color changes—and there is that shyness of the antelope (which I delight in) in her manner so much, that I think she must have preserved her the whitest white in the rooms, and only looked at any thing else when I thought she might perceive and feel embarrassed by my scrutiny. After all, there may be something of association in this. She is a friend of Augusta’s and whatever she loves, I can’t help liking.

"Her mother, the Marchioness, talked to me a little; and I was twenty times on the point of asking her to introduce me to sa Alle, but I stopped short. This comes of that affray with the Carlistas.

"Earl Grey told me, laughingly, of a paragraph in the last Moniteur, which has stated, among other symptoms of rebellion, some particulars of the sen-soir occasioned in all our government gazettes by the ‘tear’ lines,—only amplifying, in its restatement, an epigram (by-the-by, no epigram except in the Greek acception of the word) into a Roman.
I wonder the Couriers, &c., &c., have not translated that part of the Moniteur, with additional comments.

"The Princess of Wales has requested Fuseli to paint from ‘the Corsair;’ leaving to him the choice of any passage for the subject: so Mr. Locke tells me.
Tired, jaded, seized, and supine—must go to bed.

"Rowan, at least Romance, means a song some times, as in the Spanish. I suppose this is the Moniteur’s meaning, unless he has confused it with the Corsair.

"Albany, March 29.

"This night got into my new apartments, rented of Lord Althorpe, on a lease of seven years. Speccious, and room for my books and sables. In the house, too, another advantage. The last few days or whole week, have been very abstemious, regular in exercise, and yet very well.

"Yesterday, dined à la carte at the Cocoa with Scrope Davies—ate from six till midnight—drank between us one bottle of champagne, and six of claret, neither of which wines ever affect me. Offered to take Scrope home in my carriage; but he was tipsy and pious, and I was obliged to leave him on his knees, praying to God not to pardon. No headache, nor sickness that night nor to-day. Got up, if any thing, earlier than usual—spared with Jackson ad audeorem, and have been much better than for many days. I have heard nothing more from Scrope. Yesterday paid him four thousand eight hundred pounds—a debt of some standing, and which I wished to have paid before. My mind is much relieved by the removal of that debt.

"Augusta wants me to make it up with Carlisle. I have refused every body else, but I can't deny her anything; so I must even do it, though I had as lief 'drink up Eisel—eat a crocodile.' Let me see—ward, the Hollands, the Lambs, Rogers, &c., &c., every body more or less, have been trying for the last two years to accommodate this couple quarrel to no purpose. I shall laugh if Augusta succeeds.

"Redde a little of many things—shall get in all my books to-morrow. Luckily, this room will hold them—with 'ample room and verge, &c., the characters of hell to trace.' I must set about some employment soon; my heart begins to eat itself again.

"April 8.

"Out of town six days. On my return, find my poor little pagod, Napoleon, pushed off his pedestal; the thieves are in Paris. It is his own fault. Like Milo he would rend the oak; but it closed again, wedged his hands, and now the beasts—lion, bear, down to the dirtiest jackal—may all tear him. That Muscovite winter wedged his arms; ever since, he has fought with his feet and teeth. The last may still leave their marks; and I guess now (as the Yankees say) that he will yet play them a pass. He is in their rear—between them and their homes. Query—will they ever reach them?

"Sundays, April 9, 1814.

"I mark this day!

"Napoleon Bonaparte has abdicated the throne of the world. 'Excellent well.' Methinks Sylla did better; for he resigned, and signed in the height of his sway, red with the slaughter of his foes— the finest instance of glorious contempt of the rascals upon record. Diodetic did well too—Amurath not amiss; had he become in the capital, and then talk of his readiness to give up what is already gone!! 'What whining monk art thou—what holy chest?' 'Sdeath! Dianysius at Corinth was yet a king to this. The 'isle of Elba' to retire to! Well—if it had been Caprea, I should have marvelled less. I see men's minds are but a parcel of their fortunes.' I am utterly bewildered and confounded.

"I don't know—but I think I, even I, (an insect compared with this creature,) have set my life on casts not a millionth part of this man's. But, after all, a crown may be not worth dying for. Yet, to outlive Loboz for this!! Oh that Juvenal or Johnson could rise from the dead! 'Expendé—quot libras in duce summo inventis! I knew they were light in the balance of mortality; but I thought their living dust weighed more carats. Alas! this imperial diamond hath a flaw in it, and is now hardly fit to stick in a glazier's pencil; the pen of the historian won't rate it worth a duet.

"Psha! 'something too much of this.' But I won't give him up even now; though all his admirers have, 'like the Thanes, fall'n from him.'"

"April 10.

"I do not know that I am happiest when alone; but this I am sure of, that I never am long in the society even of her I love. (God knows too well, and the Devil probably too,) without a yearning for the company of my lamp and my utterly-confused and tumbled-over library. Even in the day, I send away my carriage oftener than I use or abuse it. Per exemplo,—I have not stirréd out of these rooms for these four days past; but I have spared for exercise (windows open) with Napoleon an hour daily, to attenuate and keep up the ethereal part of me. The more violent the fatigue, the better my spirits for the rest of the day; and then, my evenings have that calm nothingness of languor, which I most delight in. To-day I have boxed one hour—written an ode to Napoleon Bonaparte—copied it—eaten six biscuits—drank four bottles of soda-water—redde away the rest of my time—besides giving poor a world of advice about this mistress of his, who is plaguing him into a phthisic and intolerable tedium. I am a pretty fellow truly to lecture about the sect. No matter, my counsellors are all thrown away.

"April 13, 1814.

"There is ice at both poles, north and south—all extremes are the same—misery belongs to the highest and the lowest only,—to the emperor and the beggar, when unsxipenced and unthrone. There is, to be sure, a damned insipid medium—an equinoctial line—no one knows where, except upon maps and measurement.

"And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to richest wealth.'

I will keep no further journal of it at same hetermal torchlight; and, to prevent me from returning, like a dog, to the vomit of memory, I tear out the remaining leaves of this volume, and write, in speculanda,—'that the Bourbons are restored!!' 'Hang up philosophy.' To be sure, I have long despised myself and man, but I never spat in the face of my species before—O fool! I shall go mad."
EXTRACTS FROM A JOURNAL

IN SWITZERLAND.

"September 18, 1816.

"Yesterday, September 17th, I set out with Mr. Hobhouse on an excursion of some days to the mountains.

"September 17.

"Rose at five; left Diordati about seven, in one of the country carriages, (a char-bane,) our servants on horseback. Weather very fine; the lake calm and clear; Mont Blanc and the Aiguille of Argentavres both very distinct; the borders of the lake beautiful. Reached Lausanne before sunset; stopped and slept at. Went to bed at nine; slept till five o'clock.

"Called by my courier; got up. Hobhouse walked on before. A mile from Lansanne, the road overflowed by the lake; got on horseback and rode till within a mile of Vevey. The colt young, but went very well. Overtook Hobhouse, and resumed the carriage, which is an open one. Stopped at Vevey two hours, (the second time I had visited it;) walked to the church; view from the church-yard superb; within it General Ludlow (the regicide's) monument—black marble—long inscription—Latin, but simple; he was an exile two-and-thirty years—one of King Charles's judges. Near him Broughton (who read King Charles's sentence to Charles Stuart) is buried, with a queer and rather canting, but still a republican inscription. Ludlow's house shown; it retains still its inscription—'Omne solum fortia.' Walked down to the lake side; servants, carriage, saddle-horses—all set off and left us planta a la, by some mistake, and we walked on after them towards Clarens; Hobhouse ran on before, and overtook them at last. Arrived the second time (first time was by water) at Clarens. Went to Chillon through scenery worthy of 1 know not whom; went over the Castle of Chillon again. On our return, met an English party in a carriage; a lady in it fast asleep—fast asleep in the most anti-narcotic spot in the world—excellent! I remember at Chamoine, in the very eyes of Mont Blanc, hearing another woman, English also, exclaim to her party, 'Did you ever see any thing more rural?—as if it was Highgate, or Hampstead, or Brompton, or Hayes—rural!" Quotha? rocks, pines, torrents, glaciers, clouds, and summits of eternal snow far above them—and rural!

"After a slight and short dinner we visited the Chateau de Clarens; an English woman has rented it recently; (it was not let when I saw it first;) the roses are gone with their summer; the family out, but the servants desired us to walk over the interior of the mansion. Saw on the table of the saloon Blair's Sermons, and somebody else (I forget who's) sermons, and a set of noisy children. Saw all worth seeing, and then descended to the 'Bosquet de Julie,' &c., &c.; our guide full of Reusson, whom he is eternally confusing with St. Preaux, and mixing the man and the book. Went again as far as Chillon to re-visit the little torrent from the hill behind it. Sunset reflected in the lake. Have to get up at five to-morrow to cross the mountains on horseback; carriage to be sent round; lodged at my old cottage—hospital and comfortable; tired with a longish ride on the colt, and the subsequent jolting of the char-bane, and my scramble in the hot sun.

"Mcm. The corporal who showed the wonders of Chillon was as drunk as Blucher; he was deaf also, and thinking every one else so, roared out the legends of the castle so fearfully. However, we saw things from the gallow to the dungeons* (the porence and the cachots,) and returned to Clarens with more freedom than belonged to the fifteenth century.

"September 19.

"Rose at five. Crossed the mountains to Mont bovon on horseback, and on mules, and, by dint of scrambling, on foot also; the whole route beautiful as a dream, and now to me almost as indistinct. I am so tired—for, though healthy, I have not the strength I possessed but a few years ago. At Montbovon we breakfasted; afterward, on a steep ascent, dismounted; tumbled down; cut a finger open: the baggage also got loose and fell down a ravine, till stopped by a large tree; recovered baggage; horse tired and drooping; mounted mule. At the approach of the summit of Dent Jument† dismounted again with Hobhouse and all the party. Arrived at a lake in the very bosom of the mountains; left our quadrupeds with a shepherd, and ascended farther; came to some snow in patches, upon which my forehead's perspiration fell like rain, making the same dints as in a sieve; the chill of the wind and the snow turned me giddy, but I scrambled on and upwards. Hobhouse went to the highest pinnacle; I did not, but paused, within a few yards (at an opening of the cliff.) In coming down, the guide tumbled three times; I fell a laughing, and tumbled too—the descent luckily soft, though steep and slippery. Hobhouse also fell, but nobody hurt. The whole f the mountains superb. A shepherd on a very steep and high cliff playing upon his pipe; † very different from Areudia, where I saw the pastors with a long musket instead of a crook, and pistols in their girdles. Our Swiss shep'- herd's pipe was sweet, and his tune agreeable. I saw a cow stray'd; am told that they often break their necks on and over the crags. Descended to

BYRON'S WORKS.

Monthovan; pretty, scraggy village, with a wild river and a wooden bridge. Hobhouse went to fish—caught one. Our carriage not come; our horses mules, &c., knocked up; ourselves fatigued.

The vignerons pointed out to-day's journey comprised on one side the greatest part of Lake Leman: on the other, the valleys and mountain of the canton of Fribourg, and an immense plain, with the lakes of Neuchâtel and Morat, and all which the borders of the Lake of Geneva inherit; we had both sides of the Jura before us in one point of view, with Alps in plenty. In passing a ravine the guide recommended strenuously a quickening of pace, as the stones fall with great rapidity and occasional damage; the advice is excellent, but, like most good advice, impracticable, the road being so rough that neither mules, nor mankind, nor horses, can make any violent progress. Passed without fractures or menace thereof.

"The music of the cow's bells* (for their wealth, like the patriarch's, is cattle) in the pastures, which reach to a height far above any mountains in Britain, and the shepherds shouting to us from crag to crag, and playing on their reeds where the steeps appeared almost inaccessible, with the surrounding scenery, realized all that I have ever heard or imagined of a pastoral existence,—much more so than Greece or Austria;—which is far too much at the sabre and musket order, and if there is a crook in one hand, you are sure to see a gun in the other—; but this was pure and unmixed—solitary, savage, at one time they played the 'Rans des Vaches' and other airs, by way of farewell. I have lately reenlagemented my mind with nature."

* September 20.

"Up at six; off at eight. The whole of this day's journey an average of between from two thousand seven hundred to three thousand feet above the level of the sea. This valley, the longest, narrowest, and considered the finest of the Alps, little traversed by travellers. Saw the bridge of La Roche. The bed of the river very low and deep, between immense rocks, and rapid as anger,—a man and a mule said to have tumbled over without damage. The people looked free, and happy, and rich (which last implies not mixed—isolating) between the emblazon of the sabre and musket order, and if there is a crook in one hand, you are sure to see a gun in the other—; but this was pure and unmixed—solitary, savage, at one time they played the 'Rans des Vaches' and other airs, by way of farewell. I have lately reenlagemented my mind with nature."

* September 20.

"Before ascending the mountain, went to the torrent (seven in the morning) again; the sun upon it, forming a rainbow of the lower part of all colors, but principally purple and gold; the bow moving as you move; I never saw any thing like this; it is only in the sunshine. Ascended the Wengen mountain; at noon reached a valley on the summit; left the horses, took off my coat, and went to the summit, seven thousand feet (English feet) above the level of the sea, and about five thousand above the valley we left in the morning. On one side snow, on the other, a magnificent range of mountains; all her glaciers; then the Dent d'Argent, shining like truth; then the Little Giant, (the Kleine Eiger) and the Great Giant, (the Grosse Eiger) and last, not least, the Wetterhorn. The height of the Jungfrau is thirteen thousand feet above the sea, eleven thousand above the valley: she is the highest of this range. Heard the avalanches falling every five minutes, nearly. From whence we stood, on the Wengen Alp, we had all these in view on one side; on the other, the clouds rose from the opposite valley, curling up perpendicular precipices like the foam of the ocean of hell, during a spring that was white and sulphury, andimmense size, depth in appearance. As we ascended was (of course) not of so precipitous a nature; but on arriving at the summit, we looked down upon the other side upon a boiling sea of cloud, rushing against the crags on which we stood, these crags on one side quite perpendicular, stayed a quarter of an hour; began to descend; quite clear from cloud on that side of the mountain. In passing the masses of snow, I made some snowballs and Hobhouse disposed to get well;"

† Manfred, Act II., Scene II.
‡ Manfred, Act I., Scene II.
I tried to pass my horse over; the horse sunk up to the chin, and of course he and I were in the mud together; bemired, but not hurt; laughed, and rode on. Arrived at the Grindelwald; dined, mounted again, and rode to the higher glacier—like a frozen hurricane. Starlight, beautiful, but a devil of a path! Never mind, got safe in; a little lightning, but the whole of the day as fine in point of weather as the day on which Paradise was made. Passed whole woods of withered pines, all withered; trunks stripped and lifeless, branches lifeless; done by a single winter.

September 24.

"Set off at seven; up at five. Passed the black glacier, the mountain Wetterhorn on the right; crossed the Scheideek mountain; came to the Rose glacier, said to be the largest and finest in Switzerland. I think the Bossou glacier at Chamouni as fine; Hobhouse does not. Came to the Reichenbach waterfall, two hundred feet high; halted to rest the horses. Arrived in the valley of Oberland; rain came on; drenched a little; only four hours' rain, however, in eight days. Came to the lake of Brienz, then to the town of Brienz; changed. In the evening, four Swiss peasant girls of Oberland came and sang the airs of their country; two of the voices beautiful—the tunes also; so wild and original, and at the same time of great sweetness. The singing is over; but below stairs I hear the notes of a fiddle, which bode no good to my night's rest; I shall go down and see the dancing.

September 25.

The whole town of Brientz were apparently gathered together in the rooms below; pretty music and excellent walzing; the dancing much better than in England; the English can't walz, never could, never will. One man, with his pipe in his mouth, but danced as well as the others; some other dances in pairs and in fours, and very good. I went to bed, but the revelry continued below late and early. Brienz but a village. Rose early. Embarked on the lake of Brienz; rowed by the women in a long boat; presently we put to shore, and another woman jumped in. It seems it is the custom here for the boats to be manned by women; four or five men and three women in our bark, all the women took an oar, and but one man.

Got to Interlachen in three hours; pretty lake; not so large as that of Thoun. Dined at Interlachen. Girl gave me some flowers; and made me a speech in German, of which I know nothing; I do not know whether the speech was pretty, but as the woman was, I hope so. Reembarked on the lake of Thoun; fell asleep part of the way; sent our horses round; found people on the shore, blowing up a rock with gunpowder; they blew it up near our boat, only telling us a minute before: mere stupidity, but they might have broken our oars. Got to Thoun in the evening; the weather has been tolerable the whole day. But as this wild part of our tour is finished, it don't matter to us; in all the desirable part, we have been the most lucky in warmth and clearness of atmosphere.

September 26.

"Being out of the mountains, my journal must be as flat as my journey. From Thoun to Berne, good road, hedges, villages, industry, property, and all sorts of tokens of insipid civilization. From Berne to Fribourg; different canton; Catholics; passed a field of battle; Swiss beat the French in one of the late wars against the French republic. Bought a dog. The greater part of this tour has been on horseback, on foot, and on mule.

September 28.

"Saw the tree planted in honor of the battle of Morat; three hundred and forty years old; a good deal decayed. Left Fribourg, but first saw the cathedral; high tower. Overtook the baggage of the nuns of La Trappe, who are removing to Normandy, afterward a coach, with a quantity of nuns in it. Proceeded along the banks of the lake of Neuchâtel; very pleasing and soft, but not so mountainous—at least, the Jura, not appearing so, after the Bernese Alps. Reached Yverdun in the dusk; a long line of large trees on the border of the lake; fine and sombre; the Auberge nearly full—a German Princess and scull got rooms.

September 29.

"Passed through a fine and flourishing country, but not mountainous. In the evening reached Au bonte, (the entrance and bridge something like that of Durham,) which commands by far the fairest view of the Lake of Geneva; twilight; the moon on the lake; a grove on the height, and of very noble trees. Here Tavernier (the eastern traveller) bought (or built) the chateau, because the site resembled and equalled that of Erivan, a frontier city of Persia; here he finished his voyages, and I this little excursus,—for I am within a few hours of Diodati and have little more to see, and no more to say."
EXTRACTS FROM A JOURNAL

IN ITALY.

"Ravenna, January 4, 1821.

"A sudden thought strikes me." Let me begin a journal once more. The last I kept was in Switzerland, in record of a tour made in the Bernese Alps, after which I made to return to London in 1816, and I suppose that she has it still, for she wrote to me that she was pleased with it. Another, and longer, I kept in 1819-1814, which I gave to Thomas Moore in the same year.

"This morning I got up me late, as usual—weather bad—bad as England—worse. The snow of last week melting to the sirocco of to-day, so that there were two—bad things at once. Could not even get to ride on horseback in the forest. Stayed at home all morning—looked at the fire—wondered when the post would come. Post came at the Ave Maria, instead of half-past one o'clock, as it ought. Galigianni's Messengers, six in number, a letter from Faenza, but none from England. Very sulky in consequence, (for there ought to have been letters,) and ate in consequence a copious dinner; for when I am vexed, it makes me swallow quicker—but drank very little.

"I was out of spirits—read the papers—thought what fame was, on reading, in a case of murder, that Mr. Wyche, grocer, at Tunbridge, sold some bacon, flour, cheese, and, it is believed, some plums, to some gipsy woman accused. He had on his counter (I quote faithfully) a book, the Life of Pamela, which he was tearing for waste paper, &c., &c. In the cheese was found, &c., and a 'leaf' of powdered wrapped round the bacon! What would Richardson, the vainest and luckiest of living authors (i.e. while alive)—he who, with Aaron Hill, used to prophesy and chuckle over the presumed fall of Fielding (the prose Homer of human nature) and of Pope (the most beautiful of poets)—what would he have said could he have traced his pages from their place on the French prince's toilettes (see Boswell's Johnson) to the grocer's counter, and the gipsy-murderess's bacon!!!

"What would he have said? what can any body say, save what Solomon said long before us? After all, it is but passing from one counter to another, from the book-seller's to the other tradesman's—Grocer or pastry-cook. For my part, I have met with most poetry upon trunks; so that I am apt to consider the trunk-maker as the sexton of authorship.

"Wrote five letters in about half an hour, short and savage to all my rascally correspondents. Carriage came. Heard the news of three murders at Faenza and Faenza, and a sailor, and an attorney—all last night. The first two in a quarrel, the latter by premeditation.*

"Three weeks ago—almost a month—the 7th it was—I picked up the commandant, mortally wounded, out of the street; he died in my house; assassins unknown, but presumed political. His brother wrote from Rome the last night to thank me for having assisted him in this last adventure. Poor fellow! He was a pity; he was a good soldier, but imprudent. It was eight in the evening when they killed him. We heard the shot; my servants and I ran out, and found him lying on the ground, with five balls in his mortal—by slugs they seemed. I examined him, but did not go to the dissection next morning.

"Carriage at eight or so—went to visit La Contessa G. Found her playing on the pianoforte—told till ten, when the Count, her father, and the no less Count, her brother, came in from the theatre. Play, they said, Allier's Filippo—well received.

"Two days ago the King of Naples passed through Bologna on his way to congress. My servant Luigi brought the news. I had sent him to Bologna for a lamp. How will it end? Time will show.

"Came home at eleven, or rather before. If the road and weather are comfortable, mean to ride tomorrow. High time—almost a week at this work—snow, sirocco, one day—frost and snow the other—sad climate for Italy. But the two seasons, last and present, are extraordinary. Read a Life of Leonardo da Vinci, by Rossi—ruminated—wrote this much, and will go to bed.

"January 5, 1821.

"Rose life—dull and drooping—the weather dripping and dense. Snow on the ground, and sirocco above in the sky, like yesterday. Roads up to the horse's belly, so that riding (at least for pleasure) is not very feasible. Added a postscript to my letter to Murray. Read the conclusion, for the fiftieth time (I have read all W. Scott's novels at least fifty times) of the third series of Tales of my Landlord,—grand work—Scotch Fielding, as well as great English poet—wonderful man! I long to get drunk with him.

"Dined versus six o'clock. Forgot that there was a plum-pudding, (I have added, lately, entries to my family of views,) and had dined before I knew it. Drunk half a bottle of some sort of spirits—of wine; for what they call brandy, rum & c., & c., here is nothing but spirits of wine, colored accordingly. Did not eat two apples, which were placed, by way of dessert. Fed the two cats, a peahawk, and tame (but not tamed) crow. Read Mitford's History of Greece—Xenophon's Retreat of the Ten Thousand. Up to this present moment: writing, six in plates before eight o'clock—French hours, not Italian.

"Hear the carriage—order pistols and great coat, as usual—necessary articles. Weather cold—carriage open, and inhabitants somewhat savage—rather treacherous and highly inflamed by politics. Fine fellows, though—good materials for a nation. Out of chaos God made a world, and out of high passions comes a people.

"Clock strikes—going out to make love. Something perilous, but not disagreeable. Memorandum that snow will fall to-morrow. It is rather antique, but will do with a little repair.

"Thaw continues—hopeful that riding may be practicable to-morrow. Sent the papers to Alli—grand events coming.

"Eleven o'clock and nine minutes. Visited La Contessa G. Nata G. G. Found her beginning my letter of answer to the thanks of Alessio del Pinto of Rome for assisting his sister, the late countess, to procure copies of such blunders as I had begged her to pen for my reply for the purer Italian, I am being an ultra-romantic, little skilled in the set phrase of Tuscany. Cut short the letter—finish it another day. Talked of Italy, patriotism, Allieri, Madame Albani, and other branches of learning. Also Salust's Conspiracy of Catiline, and the war of Jugurtha. At nine came in her brother, Il Conte Pietro—ten, her father, Conte Ruggiero.

"Heard of this curious warfare—of the Highlanders and Hampton modes of broadsword exercise, in both whereof I was once a moderate master of fence.' Settled that the R. will break out on the 7th or 8th of March, in which appointment I almost believed that I had broken out in October. 1820. But those Bolongese shirked the Romagnolus.

"It is all one to Ranger. One must not be particular, but take rebellion when it lies in the way. Come home—read the 'Ten Thousand' again, and will go to bed.

"Mem.—Ordered Fletcher (at four o'clock this afternoon) to copy out seven or eight apothegms of Bacon, in which he has detected such blunders as a school-boy might detect, rather than commit. Such are the sages! What must they be, when such as I can stumble on their mistakes or misstatements? I will go to bed, for I find that I grow cynical.

"January 6, 1824.

"Mist—thaw—slop—rain. No stirring out on horseback. Read Spence's Anecdotes. Pope a fine fellow—always thought him so. Corrected blunders in nine apothegms of Bacon—all historical—and read Mitford's Greece. Wrote an epigram. Turned to a passage in Guinguneo, ditto, in Lord Holland's Lope de Vega. Wrote a note on Don Juan. "At eight rain not been settled. Heard a little music—like music. Talked with Count Pietro G. of the Italian comedian Vestris, who is now at Rome have seen him often act in Venice—a good actor—vivacious. Somewhat of a mannerist; but excellent in broad comedy, as well as in sentimental pathetic. He has made me frequently laugh and cry, neither of which is a very easy matter—at least, for a Player to produce in me.

"Thought of the state of women under the ancient Greeks—convenient enough. Present state, a remnant of the barbarism of the chivalry and feudal ages—artificial and unnatural. They ought to mind better, both fed and clothed but not mistreated in society. Well educated, too, in religion—but to read neither poetry nor politics—nothing but books of pitty and cookery. Music—drawing—dancing—also a little gardening and ploughing now and then. I have seen them ending the road in Epirus with good success. Why not, as well as hay-making and milking?

"Come home, and read Mitford again, and played with evasively—gave him supper and other reading to the epigram, but turn the same. To-night at the theatre, there being a prince on his throne in the last scene of the comedy,—the audience laughed, and asked him for a Constitution—

This shows the state of the public mind here, as well as the assassinations. It won't do. There must be a universal republic, and there ought to be.

"The crow is lame of a leg—wonder how it happened—some fool trod upon his toe, I suppose.

"The falcon pretty brisk—the cats large and noisy. The monkeys are quiet lately. It is rather antique, but will do with a little repair.

"Thaw continues—hopeful that riding may be practicable to-morrow. Sent the papers to Alli—grand events coming.

"January 7, 1824, Sunday.

"Still rain—mist—snow—drizzle—and all the in-calculable combinations of a climate, where heat and cold struggle for mastery. Read Spence, and turned over Roscoe, to find a passage I have not found.

"Read the fourth vol. of W. Scott's second series of 'Tales of my Landlord.' Dined. Read the Lugano Gazette. Read—I forget what. At eight went to conversation. Found there the Countess Geltrude, Bettina B., and Emma Inspiration.

"The Count Pietro G. took me aside to say that the Patriots have made no move from Folly, twenty miles off that to-night the government and its party mean to strike a stroke—what the Cardinal here has had orders to make several arrests immediately, and that, in consequence, the Liberals are arming, and have posted patrols in the streets, to sound the alarm and give notice to fight for it.

"He asked me 'what should be done?'—I answered, 'fight for it, rather than be taken in detail,' and offered, if any of them are in immediate apprehension of arrest, to receive them in my house (which is defensible,) and to defend them, with my servants and themselves, (we have arms and ammunition,) as long as we can,—or to try to get them away under a smoke. On going home, I offered him the pistols which I had about me—but he refused, but said he would come off to me in case of accidents.

"It was half an hour of midnight, and rains—

"as Gibbet says, 'a fine night for their enterprise—dark as hell, and blows like the devil.' If the row don't happen now, it must soon. I thought that their system of shooting people would soon produce a reaction—no, it seems not. I conjecture, perhaps, it is that we can in the way of combat, though a little out of exercise. The cause is a good one.
Drank some Seltzer-water. Mem.—received to-day a print, or etching of the story of Ugolino, by an Italian painter—different, of course, from Sir Joshua Reynolds's, and I think (as far as recollection goes; no scarce, for I maintain not good in history. For a button in my new coat.

"I wonder what figure these Italians will make in a regular row. I sometimes think that, like the Irishman's gun, (somebody had sold him a crooked one,) they will only do for 'shooting round a corner;' at least this sort of shooting has been the late terror of their exploiters. And yet, there are materials in this people, and a noble energy, if well directed. But what is to direct them? No matter. Out of such times heroes spring. Difficulties are the hot-beds of high spirits, and Freedom the mother of the few virtues incident to human nature.

"Tuesday, January 9, 1821.

"Dined. Read Johnson's 'Vanity of Human Wishes,'—all the examples and mode of giving them sublime, as well as the latter part, with the exception of an occasional couplet. I do not so much admire the programme of the humour and the mode of Sharpe's (the conversationist, as he was called in London, and a very clever man), that the first line of this poem was superfluous, and that Pope (the very best of poets I think) would have begun a once, only changing the punctuation—

"Surry masked from China to Peru!"

The former line. 'Let observation,' &c., is certainly heavy and useless. But 'tis a grand poem—and is true!—true as the 10th of Juvenal himself. The lapse of ages changes all things—time—language—

The earth—the bounds of the sea—the stars of the sky, and every thing 'about, around, and underneath' man, except man himself, who has always been, and always will be, an unlucky rascal. The infinite variety of lives conduct but to death, and the infinity of wishes leads but to disappointment. All the discoveries made at a younger day have multiplied little but existence. An extinguished disease is succeeded by some new pestilence; and a discovered world has brought little to the old one, except the—first and freedom afterward—the latter a fine thing indeed. Thus at the present moment, Europe in exchange for slavery. But it is doubtful whether 'the sovereigns' would not think the first the best present of the two to their subjects.

"At eight went out—heard some news. They say the king of Naples has declared, by couriers from Florence, to the powers (as they call now those wretches with coronets) that his constitution was 'compulsive, &c., &c., and that the Austrian barbary came home and thereupon to France. But you, dear fellow—only an avaricious one.

"It seems, indeed, that at this moment (as Lydia Langish says) there will be no elopement after all. I wish that I had known as much last night—or rather, this morning—I should have gone to bed two hours earlier. And yet I ought not to complain; for, though it is a sirocco, and heavy rain, I have not yawned for the last four days.

"Came home. Read History of Greece—before dinner had read Walter Scott's Rob Roy. Wrote address to the letter in answer to Alessandro di Clinto, who has thanked me for helping his brother (the latter commandant) understand my last month) in his last months. Have told him I only did a duty of humanity—as is true. The brother lives at Rome.

"Mended the fire with some 'sobole,' (a Romagnole word,) and gave the falcon some water.
Jash upon the shores are, one ey one, broken, but yet the ocean conquer, nevertheless. It overwhelms the Arma la, it wears the rock, and, if the Neptune were to be belied, it had been only destroyed, but made a world. In like manner, whatever the sacrifice of individuals, the great cause will gather strength, sweep down what is rugged, and fertilize (for scoured is masure) what is cultivable. And so, the mere selfish calculation ought never to be made on such occasions; and, at present, it shall not be computed by me. I was never a good arithmetician of chances, and shall not commence now.

January 10, 1821.

"Day fine—rained only in the morning. Looked over accounts. Read Campbell's Poets—marked errors of Tom (the author) for correction." Dined.

"I have been turning over different Lives of the Poets. I rarely read their works, unless an occasional flight over the classical ones, Pope, Dryden, Johnson, Gray, and those who approach them nearest,
(I leave the rant of the rest to the rant of the day,) and—I had made several reflections, but I feel sleepy, and may as well go to bed.

January 11, 1821.

"Read the letters. Corrected Tom Campbell's shil-ly work, though—style and diction—accepted—but his defence of Pope, Dryden, and Johnson, I agree with.
I am, in fact, sure it is his own cause, too—but no matter, it is very good, and does him great credit.

"Evenings.

I have found out the seal cut on Murray's letter. It is meant for Walter Scott—or Sir Walter—he is the first poet knighted since Sir Richard Blackmore. But it does not do him justice. Scott's —particularly when he recites—is a very intelligent
-courtier, and this seal says nothing.

Scott is certainly the most wonderful writer of the day. His novels are a new literature in them-

mischiefs, while he was more sedate and polished. At Cambridge—both of Trinity—my spirit rather softened, or had rounded, so we became very great friends. The description of Sabrina’s seat reminds me of our rival feats in diving. Though Cam’s is not a very translucent wave, it was fourteen feet deep, where we used to live for, and pick up—having been prevented only, round which Ida and Ann were the medium of English, French, and Italian translations. Of the real language I know absolutely nothing—except outside learned from postillions and officers in a squadron, I have never otherwise read; yet, when I like,—Sacrament—Verdutcher—Hundsfott—and so forth; but I have little of their less energetic conversation.

"I like, and a very rare woman, (I was once as desperately in love with a German woman, Constance,) and all that I have read, translated of their writings, and all that I have seen on the Rhine of their country and people—all, except the Aestrians, whom I abhor, loathe, and I cannot find words for my hate of them, and should be sorry to find deeds correspondent to my hate; for I abhor cruelty more than I abhor the Aestrians—except on an impulse, and then I am savage—but not deliberately so.

"Grillparzer is grand—antique—not so simple as the ancients, but very simple for a modern—too Madame de Staelish now and then—but altogether a great and gooody writer."

"January 13, 1821, Saturday.

"Sketched the outline and drams, pers. of an intended tragedy of Saradanaulis, which I have for some time wanted. Took the names from Dio Serrone Sicilus, (I know the history of Saradanaulis, but have guessed it, since I was twelve years old,) and read over a passage in the ninth vol. octavo of Mitford’s Greece, where he rather indicates the memory of this last of the Assyrians.

"Died—new crimes, the period mean to war with the peoples. The intelligence seems positive—let it be so—they will be beaten in the end. The king-timbers are fast finishing. There will be blood shed like washing or tears like mist; but the peoples will conquer in the end. I shall not live to see it, but I foresee it.

"I carried Teresa the Italian translation of Grillparzer’s Sappho, which she promises to read. She quarrelled with me, because I said that love was not the loftiest theme for true tragedy; and, having the advantage of her native language, and natural female eloquence, she overcame my fewer arguments. I believe she was right. I must put more love into ‘Saradanaulis’ than I intended. I speak, of course, if the times will allow me leisure. That I will hardly be a peacemaker.

"January 14, 1821.

"Turned over Seneca’s tragedies. Wrote the opening lines of the intended tragedy of Saradanaulis. Rode out some miles into the forest. Misty and rainy. Returned—distressed—wrote some more of my tragedy.

"Read Diodorus Siculius—turned over Seneca, and some other books. Wrote some more of the tragedy. Took a glass of grog. After having ridden hard in rainy weather, and scribbled, and scribbled again, the spirits (at least mine) need a little exhilaration, and I don’t like laudanum now as I used to do. So I have mixed a glass of strong waters and single waters, which I shall now proceed to empty. Therefore and thereunto I conclude this day’s diary.

"The effect of all wines and spirits upon me is however, strange. It settles, but it makes me gloomy—gloomy at the very moment of their effect, and not gay however. But it compposes for a time, though wholly.

"January 15, 1821.

"Weather fine. Received visit. Rode into the forest—dined. Returned home—distressed—dipped into a volume of Mitford’s Greece—wrote part of a scene of ‘Saradanaulis.’ Went out—heard some music—heard some politics. More ministers from the other Italian courts got to Congress. It seems certain—in that case, it will be a savage one. Talked over various important matters with one of the initiated. At ten and half returned home.

"I have just thought of something odd. In the year 1814, Moore (the poet, "par excellence," and he deservedly so (of London, of which I have spoken before), having thought of, in the same carriage, to dine with Earl Grey, the Capo Politico of the remaining whigs. Murray, the magnificent, (the illustrious publisher of that name,) had just sent me a Java gazette—I know not why or wherefore, but having let out, by way of curiosity, we found it to contain a dispute (the said Java gazette) on Moore's merits and mine. I think, if I had been there, that I could have saved them the trouble of disputing on the subject. But, the battle was over for you at six-and-twenty! Alexander had conquered India at the same age; but I doubt if he was disputed about, or his conquests compared with those of Indian Bacchus, at Java.

"It was great fame to be named with Moore: greater to be compared with him; greatest—pleasure, at least—to be with him; and, surely, an odd coincidence, that we should be dining together while they were quarrelling about us beyond the equinoctial line.

"Well, the same evening I met Lawrence, the painter, and heard one of Lord Grey's daughter's (a fine, tall, spirit-looking girl, with much of the patrician thoroughbred look of her father, which (if you please) dote (upon) play on the harp, so modestly and ingeniously, that she liked music. Well, I would rather have had my talk with Lawrence (who talked delightfully) and heard the girl than have had all the fame of Moore and me put together.

"The only pleasure of fame is that it paves the way to pleasure; and the more intellectual our pleasure, the better for the pleasure and for us too. It was, however, the first time I had heard our fame before dinner, and a girl's harp after.

January 19, 1821.

"Read—rode—fired pistols—returned—dined—wrote—visited—heard music—talked nonsense—and went home.

"Wrote part of a tragedy—advance in act 1st with 'all deliberate speed.' Bought a blanket. The weather is still muggy as a London May—mist, nizzle, the air replete with Scotticisms, which, though fine in the descriptions of Ossian, are somewhat tiresome, in real, prosaic perspective. Politics still mysterious.

January 17, 1821.

"Rode i' the forest—fired pistols—dined. Arrived, a packet of books from England and Lombardy—English, Italian, French, and Latin. Read till eight—went out.

January 19, 1821.

"To-day, the post arriving late, did not ride. Read letters—only two gazettes, instead of twelve new one. Made Lega write to that negligent Galigiani, and added a postscript. Dined.

"At eight proposed to go out. Lega came in with a letter about a bill unpaid at Venice, which I thought paid months ago. I flew into a paroxysm of rage, which almost made me have not been well ever since. I desire it for being such a fool—but it was provoking—a set of scoundrels! It is, however, but five-and-twenty pounds.

January 19, 1821.

"Rode Winter's wind somewhat more unkind than ingratitude itself, though Shakspeare says otherwise. At least, I am so much more accustomed to meet with ingratitude than the north wind, that I thought the latter the sharper of the two. I had met with both in the course of the twenty-four hours, so could judge.

"Thought of a plan of education for my daughter. Alas, I ought to begin with her studies. Wrote a letter—afterward a postscript. Rather in low spirits—certainly hippish—liver touchard—will take a dose of salts.

I have been reading the Lin, by myself and daughter, of Mr. R. L. Edgeworth, the father of the Miss Edgeworth. It is altogether a great name. In 1815, I recollect to have met them in the fashionable world of London (at which I then stood an item, a fraction, the segment of a circle, the unit of a million, the nothing of something) in the assembly lies of the hour, and at a breakfast of Sir Hanbury and Lady Davy's, to which I was invited for the nonce. I had been the lion of 1812; but Edgeworth and Madame de Stael, with 'the Cosack!', towards the end of 1813, were the exhibitions of the succeeding year.

I thought Edgeworth a fine old fellow, of a clarity, elderly, red complexion, but active, brisk, and endless. He was seventy, but did not look fifty—no, nor forty-eight. I had seen poor Fitzpatrick not very long before—a man of pleasure, wit, eloquence, all things. He tottered—but still talked like a gentleman, though feebly. Edgeworth bounded about, and talked loud and long; but he seemed neither weakly nor decrepit, and hardly old.

"He began by saying 'that he had given Dr. Parr a dressing, who had taken him for an Irish bog-trotter,' &c. &c. Now I, who know Dr. Parr, and who know (not by experience—for I never should have presumed so far as to contend with him—but by the most unassuming of their persons) that it is not so easy a matter to 'dress him,' thought Mr. Edgeworth an assessor of what was not true. He could not have stood before Parr an instant. For the rest, he seemed intelligent, vehement, vivacious, and full of life. He bids fair for a hundred years.

"He was not so much admired in London, and I remember a 'ryght merrie and conciliated jest which was rife among the gallants of the day,—viz. a paper had been presented for the recall of Mrs. Siddons to the stage, (she having lately taken leave, to the loss of ages,—for nothing ever was, or can be, like her,) to which all men had been called to subscribe. Whereupon, Thomas Moore, of profane and poetical memory, did propose that a similar paper should be subscribed and circumscribed 'for the recall of Mr. Edgeworth to Ireland.'

"The fact was—every body cared more about her. She was a nice little unassuming 'Jannie Dams'-looking bodi,' as we Scotch say—and, if not hand some, certainly not ill-looking. Her conversation was a quiet, or rather, a wordless kind. One would have guessed she could write her name; whereas her father talked, not as if he could write nothing else, but as if nothing else was worth writing.

As for Mrs. Edgeworth, I forget—except that I think she was the youngest of the party. Altogether, they were an excellent cage of the kind; and succeeded for two months, till the landing of Madame de Stael.

"To turn from them to their works, I admire them; but they excite no feeling, and they leave no love—except for some Irish steward or postillion. However, the impression of intellect and prudence is profound—and may be useful.

January 20, 1821.

"Rode—fired pistols. Read from Grimm's Correspondence. Dined—went out—heard music—returned—wrote a letter to the Lord Chamberlain to request him to prevent the theatres from representing the 'Duco,' which the Italian papers say that they are going to act. This is pretty work—what I without asking my consent, and even in opposition to it!

January 13, 1821.

"Fine, clear, frosty day—that is to say, an Italian frost, for their winters hardly get beyond snow; for which reason nobody knows how to skate (or skat) —a Dutch and English accomplishment.

* In this, I rather think he was misinformed:—whatever men there may be in the Joel, I have not, as far as I can recollect, the slightest claim to a Moore.
Rode out, as usual, and fired pistols. Good shooting—broke four or five, and rather small, bottles, in four shots, at fourteen paces, with a common pair of pistols and indifferent powder. Almost as good fencing or shooting—considering the difference of powder and pistols—as when in 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812, 1813, 1814, it was my business to split walking-sticks, wafers, half-crowns, shillings, and even the eye of a walking-stick, at twelve paces, with a single bullet—and all by eye and calculation; for my hand is not steady, and apt to change with the very weather. To the prowess which I here note, Joe Manton and others can bear testimony—for the former taught and the latter have seen me do, these feats.

Dined—visited—came home—read. Remark'd on an anecdote in Grimm's Correspondence, which says that 'Regnard et la plupart des poètes comiques s'entendent bien mieux en ménageole, et que M. de Voltaire, qui est tres gai, n'a jamais fait que des tragédies—et que la comedie galante est le seul genre où il n'ait point réussi.' C'est que celui qui rit et celui qui fait rire sont deux hommes fort différents," vol. vi.

"At this moment a feel as bilious as the best comic writer of them all, (even as Regnard himself, the next to, Moliere, who has written some of the best comedies in any language, and who is supposed to have committed suicide,) and am not in spirits to continue my proposed tragedy of Sardanapalus, which I have, for some days, ceased to compose.

"To-morrow is my birthday—that is to say, at twelve o'clock, midnight, i.e. in twelve minutes, I shall have completed thirty and three years of age!!—and I go to my bed with a heaviness of heart at having lived so long, and to so little purpose.

"It is three minutes past twelve.—'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock,' and I am now thirty-three.

"Hence, sages, Phoebus, Phoebus, Labanor, and I—"

but I don't regret them so much for what I have done, as for what I might have done.

"Through life's road, so dim and dirty, I have dropt to three-and thirty.

What have these years left to me?

Nothing except thirty-three.

January 22, 1821."

January 23, 1821.

"Fine day—read—rode—fired pistols, and returned. Dined—read. Went out at eight—made the usual visit. Heard of nothing but war—" the cry is still, 'They come.' The Carus seem to have a plan—nothing fixed among themselves, how, when, or what to do. In that case, they will make nothing of this project, so often postponed, and never put in action.

"Came home, and gave some necessary orders, in case of circumstances requiring a change of place. I shall act according to what may seem proper, when I hear decidedly what the Barbarians mean to do. At present, they are building a bridge of boats over the Po; the Turks will probably show. I think of retiring towards Ancona, nearer the northern frontier; that is to say, if Teresa and her father are obliged to retire, which is most likely, as all the family are Liberals. If not, I shall stay. But my movements will depend upon the lady's wishes, for myself, it is much the same.

"I am somewhat puzzled what to do with my little daughter, and my effects, which are of some quantity and value,—and neither of them do in the east of war where I think of going. But there is an elderly lady who will take charge of her, and T. says that the Marchese C. will undertake to hold the Dutch in the back chaplet in the meantime. Half of France is engaged in their affairs in marching trim. A pretty Carnival! The blackguards might as well have waited till Lent."

January 29, 1821.

"Returned—met some masques in the Corso—" Vive la bagatelle!"—the Germans are on the Po, the Barbarians at the gate, and their masters in council at Leybach, (or whatever the erudition of the sound may syllable into a human pronunciation,) and lo! they dance and sing and make merry, 'for to-morrow they may die.' Why can say that the Arlequins are not right? Like the Lady Baus- siere, and old friend Burton—I 'rode on.'

"Dined—(damn this pen!)—beef tough—there is no beef in Italy worth a curse; unless a man could eat an old ox with the hide on, in the sun.

"The principal persons in the events which may occur in a few days, are gone out on a shooting party. If it were like a Highland hunting," a pretext of the chase for a grand reunion of counsellors and chief, it would be all very well. But it is nothing more or less than a real smiirling, peeping, small-shit, water-hen waste of powder, ammunition, and shot, for their own special amusement—a rare set of fellows for a man to risk his neck with," as 'Marshall Wells' says in the Black Dwarf.

"If they gather,—whilk is to be doubted,—they will not muster a thousand men. The reason of this is, that the populace are not interested,—only the higher and middle orders.

"They wish that the peasantry were: they are a fine savage race of two-legged leopards. But the Bolognese won't—the Romangnoules can't without them. Or, if they try, what then? They will try, and man can do no more—and, if he would but try his utmost, much might be done. The Dutch, for instance, against the Spaniards—then, the tyrants of Europe—since, the slaves—and, lately, the freedmen.

"The year 1820 was not a fortunate one for the individual or whatever it may be for the nation. I lost a lawsuit, after two decisions in my favor. The project of lending money on an Irish mortgage was finally rejected by my wife's trustee, after a year's hope and trouble. The Hochdame laws had endured fifteen years, and always prospered till I married; since which, every thing has gone wrong— with me, at least.

"In the same year, 1820, the Countess T.G. nata Gs. G. in the picture very much of all I said and did to prevent it, would separate from her husband, II Cavaliier Commedatore G. &c., &c., &c., and all on the account of 'P. F. clerk of this parish.' The other little petty vexations of the year—upturns in carriages—the murder of people before one's door, and drowning in one's bed—the cramp in swimming—"
January 28, 1871.

* Received a letter from Lord Sidney Osborne, state secretary of the Seven Islands—a fine fellow—clever—dished in England five years ago, and came abroad to retreat and renew. He wrote from Ancona, in his way back to Corfu, on some matters of our own. He is son of the late Duke of Leys by a second marriage. He wants me to go to Corfu. Why not?—perhaps I may, next spring.

Answered Murray's letter—read—lounged. Scrapped this additional page of life's log-book.

One day more is over, of it and me;—but which is best, life or death, the gods only know," as Socrates said to his judges, on the breaking up of the tribunal. Two thousand years since that sage's declaration of ignorance not enlightened us more upon this important point; for, according to the Christian dispensation, no one can know whether he is sure of salvation—ever the most righteous—since a single slip may throw him on his back, like a skater, while gliding smoothly to his paradise. Now, therefore, whatever the certainty of faith in the facts may be, the certainty of the individual as to his happiness or misery is no greater than it was under Jupiter.

"It has been said that the immortality of the soul is a 'grand peut être'—but still it is a grand one. Every body clings to it—the stupidest, and dullest, and wickedest of human bipeds is still persuaded that he is immortal."

January 29, 1871.

"Fine day—a few mares' tails portending change, but the sky clear, upon the whole. Rode—fired pistols—good shooting. Coming back, met an old nabob and purchased a shilling of salt. If that was to be bought, I have given more to my fellow-creatures in this life—sometimes for vice, but, if not more often, at least more considerably, for virtue—than I now possess. I never in my life so much as given a poor man in honest distress—but, no matter. The scoundrels who have all along persecuted me* (with the help of  who has crowned their base tricks)—and, when all is done to me, it will be when this hand that writes is as cold as the hearts which have stung me.

"Returning, on the bridge near the mill, met an old woman. I asked her age—she said, 'The crock.' I asked where she was going (though myself an Italian). says the devil her three crosses meant. He said, ninety years, and that she had five years more to boot!! I repeated the same three times, not to mistake—ninety-five years!!—and she was yet rather active—heard my question, for she answered it—saw me, for she advanced towards me; and did not appear at all decrepit, though certainly touched with years. Told her to come to-morrow, and will examine her myself. I love phenomena. If she is ninety-five old, she must recollect the Cardinal Alberoni, who was legate here.

"On disembarking, found Lieutenant E. just arrived from Brindisi. Invited him to dine with me to-morrow. Did not invite him for to-day, because there was a small turbot, (Friday, fast regularly and religiously,) which I wanted to eat all myself. Ate it.

Went out—found Teresa as usual—music. The gentlemen, who make revolutions, and are gone on a shooting, are not yet returned. They don't return till Sunday—that is to say, they have been out for five days, buffooning, while the interests of a whole country are at stake, and even they themselves compromised.

"It is a difficult part to play among such a set of assassins and blockheads—but, when the scum is skinned off, or has boiled over, good may come of it. If this country could but be freed, what would be too great for the accomplishment of that desire? for the extinction of that Sigh of Ages? Let us hope. They have hoped these thousand years. The very revolvement of the chances may bring it—it is upon the dice.

"If the Neapolitans have but a single Massaniello among them, they will beat the bloody butchers of the crown and sabre. Holland, in worse circumstances, beat the Spaniards and Philip; Austria beat the English; Greece beat Xeres; and France beat Europe, till she took a tyrant; South America beats her old vultures out of their nest; and, if these men are but firm in themselves, there is nothing to shake them from without."

January 28, 1871.

"Lugano Garotto did not come. Letters from Venice. It appears that the Austrian brutes have seized my three or four pounds of English powder. The scoundrels! I hope to pay them in ball for that powder. Rode out till twilight.

"Pondered the subjects of four tragedies to be written, (life and physical sensations permitting,) to wit, Sardanapalus, already begun; Cain, a metaphysical subject, something in the style of Manfred, but in five acts, perhaps, with the chorus; Francesca of Rimini, in five acts; and I am not sure that I would not try Tibersius. I think that I could extract a something, of my tragic, at last, out of the gloomy sequestration and old age of the tyrant—and even out of his sujourn at Caprea—by softening the details, and exalting the despair which must have led to those very virtuous pleasures. For none but a powerful and gloomy mind overthrown would have had recourse to such solitary horrors,—being also, at the same time, old, and the master of the world."

"Memoranda.

"What is poetry?—The feeling of a Former world and Future.

"Thought Second.

"Why, at the very height of desire and human pleasure,—worldly, social, amorous, ambitious, or even avaricious,—does there mingle a certain sense of doubt and sorrow—a fear of what is to come—a doubt of what is? a retrospect to the past, leading to a prognostication of the future? (The best of Prophets of the Future is the Past.) Why is this? or these?—I know not, except that on a pinnacle we are most susceptible of godliness, and that we never fear falling beneath from a precipice the higher, the more awful, and the more sublime; and, therefore, I am not sure that fear is not a pleasurable sensation; at least Hope is; and what sensation is so delightful as Hope? and, if it were not for Hope what would the Future be?—in hell. It is useless to say where the Present is, for most of us know; and as for the Past, what predominates in memory?—Hope baffled. Erry, in all human affairs, it is Hope—Hope. I allow sixteen minutes, though I never counted them, to any given or supposed possession. From whatever place we commence, we know that there is no end. And yet, what good is there in knowing it? It does not make men better or wiser. During the greatest horrors of the greatest plagues, (Athens and Florence, for example—see Thucydides and Machiavel), men were in terror and predicature than ever. It is all a mystery. I feel most things, but I know nothing, except

"Past Midnight. One of the clocks.
I have been reading W. F. Schlegel (brother to the other of the name) till now, and I can make out nothing. He evidently shows a great power of words, but there is nothing to be taken hold of. He is a man of much reading, I believe, with a great deal of knowledge in history, and white corruption rising up, (in little imitation of mountains upon maps,) but containing nothing scrupulous in discharging nothing, except their own honors.

I dislike him the worse, (that is, Schlegel,) because he is always seen upon the verge of meaning. And, lo, he goes down like sunset, or melts like a rainbow, leaving a rather rich confusion,—to which he never, the above comparisons do too much honor.

"Continuing to read Mr. F. Schlegel. He is not such a fool as I took him for, that is to say, when he speaks of the North. But still he speaks of things all over the world with a kind of authority that a philosopher would disdain, and a man of common sense, feeling, and knowledge of his own ignorance, would be ashamed of. The man is evidently wanting to make an impression, like his brother,—or like George in the Vicar of Wakefield, who forgets that all the good things have been said already on the right side, and therefore 'dressed up some paradoxes' upon the wrong side—ingenious, but false, as he himself says,—to which the learned world seems nothing, nothing at all, sir. The 'learned world,' however, has said something to the brothers Schlegel.

"It is high time to think of something else. What they say of the antiquities of the North is best.

"January 28th, 1821."

"Yesterday the woman of ninety-five years of age was with me. She said her eldest son (if now alive) would have been seventy. She is thin,—short, but active—ears, and sees, and talks incessantly. Several teeth left—all in the lower jaw, and single front teeth. She is very deeply wrinkled, and has a sort of scattered gray beard over her chin, at least as long as my mustachios. Her head, in fact, resembles the drawing in crayons of Pope the poet's mother, which is in some editions of his works.

"I forgot to ask her if she remembered Alberoni, (begato her last husband,) and ask her name. Gave her a louis,—ordered her a new suit of clothes, and put her upon a weekly pension. Till now, she had worked at gathering wood and pine-nuts in the forest,—partly for fifty years old! She had twelve children, of whom some are alive. Her name is Maria Montanari.

"Met a company of the, sect (a kind of Liberal club) called the 'American' in the forest, all armed, and singing, with all their might, in Romagnole—"Non tutti soldati per la liberta," ('we are all soldiers for liberty.' They cheered me as I passed—I returned their salute, and rode on. This may show the spirit of Italy at present.

"My to-day's journal consists of what I omitted yesterday. To-day was much as usual. Have rather a better opinion of the writings of the Schlegels than I had four-and-twenty hours ago; and will amend this for further, if possible. They say, that the Piedmontese have at length risen—ca ira.

"Read Schlegel. Of Dante he says that 'at no time has the greatest and most national of all Italian poets ever been much the favorite of his countrymen.' 'Tis false! There have been more editors and commentators (and imitators, ultimately) of Dante than of any other poet, in the world. Who is his real favorite? Why, they talk Dante—write Dante—and think and dream Dante at this moment (1821) to an excess, which would be ridiculous, but that he deserves it.

"In the same style 'tis German talk of gondoliers on the Arno—a precious fellow to dare to speak of Italy!'

"He says also that Dante's chief defect is a want in a word, of gentle feelings. Of gentle feelings—and Francesca of Rimini—and the father's feelings in Ugolino—and Beatrice—and 'La Pia!' Why, there is a gentleness in Dante beyond all gentle nesse, when he is tender. It is true that, treating of the Choristers, or Heliodorus, or Hell, Dante cannot much scope or site for gentleness—but who but Dante could have introduced any 'gentleness' at all into Hell? Is there any in Milton's? No—and Dante's Heaven is all love, and glory, and majesty.

"January 12, 1821."

"The Count F. G. this evening (by commission from the C.) transmitted to me the new words for the next six months. * * * The new sacred word is * * *—the reply * * *—the rejoinder * * * The former word (now changed) was * * * there is also * * * * * * * Things seem fast coming to a crisis—ca ira!"

"We talked over various matters of moment and movement. These I omit—if they come to any thing, there will speak for themselves. After these, we spoke of Kościusko. Count R. G. told me that he has seen the Polish officers in the Italian war burst into tears on hearing his name.

"Something must be up in Piedmont—all the letters and papers are stopped. Nobody knows any thing, and the Germans are concentrating near Mantua. Of the decision of Laybach, nothing is known. This state of things cannot last long. The ferment in men's minds at present cannot be conceived without seeing it.

"Jan. 22, 1821."

"For several days I have not written any thing except a few answers to letters. In momentary expectation of any impression of some new revolution, it has been easy to settle down to the desk for the higher kinds of composition. I could do it, to be sure; for, last summer, I wrote my drama in the very bustle of Madame G. G.'s divorcement of accompaniments. At the same time, I also had the news of the loss of an important lawsuit in England. But these were only private and personal business; the present is of a different nature.

"I suppose it is this, but have some suspicion that it may be laziness, which prevents me from writing; especially as Rochefoucault says that 'laziness often masters them all—speaking of the passions. If this were true, 't could hardly be our idleness is the root of all evil,' since this is supposed to spring from the passions only—ergo, that which masters all the passions (laziness, to wit) would in so much be a good. Who knows?

"Midnight.

"I have been reading Grimm's Correspondence. He repeats frequently, in speaking of a poet, or of a man of genius in any department, even in music, (he is Grevy, for instance,) that he must have 'une âme qui se tournante un esprit violent.' How far this may be true, I know not; but if it were, I should or a poet 'poet per eccellenza;' for I have always had 'unt grave orders for some kermess and portmanteaus for the horses.

"Read some of Bowles's dispute about Pope, with all the replies and rejoinders. Perceive that my name has been introduced into the controversy, but have not time to state what I know of the subject. On some piping day of peace it is probable that I may resume it.

* * *

"Before dinner wrote a little; also, before I rode out, Count P. G. called upon me, to let me know the result of the second of the Po, at A, and at B. He returned last night. Every thing was combined under the idea that the Barbarians would pass the Po on the 15th inst. Instead of this, from some previous information or otherwise, they have hastened their march and actually passed two days ago; so that all that can be done at present in Romagna is, to stand on the alert and wait for the advance of the Neapolitans. Everything was ready, and the Neapolitans had sent on their own instructions and intentions, and calculated for the tenth and eleventh, on which days a general rising was to take place, under the supposition that the Barbarians could not as fast as they advance be as unprepared as the Sicilians are good things, and, it may be some of their own.

February 9, 1821.

I have been considering what can be the reason why I always wake at a certain hour in the morning, and always in very bad spirits—I may say, in actual despair and despondency, in all respects—even of that which pleased me over night. In about an hour or two, this goes off, and I compose either to sleep again, or at least, to quiet. In England, five years ago, I had the same kind of hypochondria, but accompanied with so violent a thirst that I have drank as many as fifteen bottles of soda-water in one day, after going to bed, and am still thirsty—calculating, however, some lost from the bursting out and effervescence and overflow of the soda-water, in drawing the corks, or striking off the necks of the bottles from mere thirsty impatience. At present, I have not the thirst; but the depression of spirits is no less violent.

I read in Edgeworth's Memoirs of something similar (except that the thirst expanded itself on swallow keep in the case of Sir F. B. Delaval)—but then he was, at least, twenty years older. What is it?—Liver? In England, Le Man (the apothecary) cured me of the thirst in three days, and it had lasted as many years. I suppose that it is all hypochondria.

What I feel most growing upon me is laziness and a disrelish more powerful than indifference. If I rouse, it is into fury. I presume that I shall end (if not earlier by accident, or some such termination) like Swift—dying a top. I confess I do not contemplate this with so much horror as he apparently did for some years before it happened. But Swift had hardly known life at the very period (thirty-three) when I feel quite an old sort of feel.

Oh! there is an organ playing in the street—a waltz, too! I must leave off to listen. They are playing a waltz, which I have heard ten thousand times at the balls in London, between 1812 and 1815. Music is a strange thing.

February 9, 1821.

At last, the kiln's in a low. The Germans are ordered to march, and Italy is, for the ten thousandth time, to become a field of battle. Last night the news came.

This afternoon, Count P. G. came to me to consult upon divers matters. We rode out together. The horses are to roll to Florence. To-morrow the decision ought to arrive, and then something will be done. Returned—dined—read—went out—talked over matters. Made a purchase of some arms for the new enrolled Americans, who are all on tiptoe to march. Grave orders for some kermess and portmanteaus for the horses.

Po Journal, January 6, 1821.

As it is, they have but fifty or sixty thousand troops, a number with which they might as well attempt to conquer the world as secure Italy in its present state. The artillery marches last, and, I presume, will advance; but the Sicilians have good things, and, it may be some of their own.

February 10, 1821.

Day passed as usual—nothing new. Barbarians still in march—not well equipped, and, of course, not well received on their route. There is some talk of a commotion at Paris.

Rode out between four and six—finished my letter to Murray on Bowles's pamphlet—added postscript. Passed the evening as usual—out till eleven—and subsequently at home.

February 11, 1821.

Wrote—had a copy taken of an extract from Petter's Letters, with reference to the conspiracy of the Doge for the purposes of Ferriero, contrary to the opinion of the matter. Heard a heavy firing of cannon towards Camacchio—the Barbarians rejoicing for their principal pig's birthday, which is to-morrow—or Saint Day—i forget which. Received a ticket for the first ball to-morrow. Shall not go to the first, but intend going to the second, as also to the Veglioni.

February 12, 1821.

To-day read a little in Louis B.'s Holland, but have written nothing since the completion of the letter on the Pope controversy. Politics are quite misty for the present. The Barbarians still upon their march. It is not easy to divine what the Italians will now do. Lord Byron will be there.

Was elected yesterday 'Socio' of the Carnival ball society. This is the fifth Carnival which I have passed. In the four former, I raked a dodg deal. In the present, I have been as sober as Lady Grace herself.

February 14, 1821.

Much as usual. Wrote, before riding out, part of a scene of 'Sardanapalus.' The first act nearly finished. The rest of the day. I am, as before—partly without, in conversations—partly at home.

Heard the particulars of the late fray at Russi, a town not far from this. It is exactly the fact at Rome and Giulia—of course, as the Barbaries writes it. Two families of Contadini (peasants) are at a feud. At a ball, the younger part of the families forget their quarrels, and dance together. An old man of one of them enters, and reproves the young men for dancing with the females of the opposite family. The male relatives of the latter resent this. Both parties rush home, and arm themselves. They meet directly, by moonlight, in the public way, and fight it out. Three are killed on the spot, and six wounded, most of them dangerously.—pretty well for two families, methinks—and all fact, of the last week. Another assassination has taken place at Cesena,—in all about forty in Romagna within these last three months. These people retain much of the middle ages.

February 15, 1821.

Last night finished the first act of Sardanapalus. To-night, or to-morrow, I ought to answer letters.

February 16, 1821.

Last night I Conte P. G. sent a man, with a bag full of bayonets, some muskets, and some hundreds of cart-ridges to my house, without apprising me, though I had seen him not half an hour before. About ten days ago, when there was to be a rising here, the Liberals and my children C. asked me to purchase some arms for a certain few of our raggamuffins. I did so immediately, and ordered ammunition, &c., and they were armed accordingly. Well—the rising is prevented by the Barbarians marching a week sooner than appointed; and an order is issued, and in force, by the Government, that all persons having arms concealed, &c., &c., shall be liable to, &c., &c.—and what do my friends, the patriots, do two days afterward? Why, they throw back upon my hands, and into my house, these very arms (without a word of warning previously) with which I had furnished them at their own request, and at my own peril and expense.

It was lucky that Lega was at home to receive them. If any of the servants had (except Tita and F. and Lega) they would have betrayed it immediately. In the mean time, if they are denounced, or discovered, I shall be in a scrape.

At nine went out—at eleven returned. Beat the crow for stealing the falcon's victuals. Read 'Tales of my Landlord'—wrote a letter—and mixed a moderate beaker of water with other ingredients.

February 18, 1821.

The news are that the Neapolitans have broken a bridge, and slain four pontifical carabiniere, while carabiniere, while carabiniere, while carabiniere, with no other effect. Besides the disrespect to neutrality, it is a pity that the first blood shed in this German quarrel should be Italian. However, the war seems begun in good earnest; for, if the Neapolitans kill the Pope's carabiniere, they will not be more delicate towards the Barbarians. If it be even so, in a short time, 'there will be news o' these cras,' as Mrs. Alison Wilson says of Jenny Blane's 'unco commercial' in the "Tales of my Landlord.'

'Turning over Grimm's Correspondence today, I found a thought of Tom Moore's in a song of Maupertuis to a female Laplander.

To vos tous lieux, Au milieu des saisons, Fault dans le Zenne dortin.'

This is Moore's—

'And these eyes may make my climate, wherever I roam.'

But I am sure that Moore never saw it; for this song was published in Grimm's Correspondence in 1815, and I knew Moore's book by heart in 1812. There is also another but an antithetical coincidence.

I am a solemn boy, Des jours sans voix, Embrît il mon destin; Mais ces longs jours, Rongent les coffres, Passoix pres des Charlotis.'

February 21, 1821.

'This is the thought, reversed, of the last stanza of the ballad on Charlotte Lynes, given in Miss Seward's Memoirs of Darwin, which is pretty—I quote from memory of these last fifteen years.

'To my first night I'll go
To those regions of snow,
Where the sun for six months never shines;
And think, even then,
He too soon came again,
To disturb me with fair Charlotte Lynes.'

'To-day I have had no communication with my Carbonari cronies; but, in the mean time, my lower apartments are full of their bayonets, muskets, cartridges, and what not. I suppose that they consider me as a depot, to be sacrificed, in case of accidents. It is no great matter, supposing that Italy could be liberated, who or what is sacrificed. It is a grand object—the very poetry of politics. Only think—a free Italy!!! Why, there has been nothing like it since the days of Augustus. I reckon the times of Caesar (Julius) free; because the commotions left every body a side to take, and the parties were pretty equal at the set out. But, afterwards, the poor innocent and legitiately businless—we shall see, or at least, some will see, what card will turn up. It is best to hope, even of the hopeless. The Dutch did more than these fellows have to do, in the Seventy Years' War.'

February 19, 1821.

' Came home solus—very high wind—lightning—moonshine—solitary stragglers muffled in cloaks—women in masks—white houses—clouds hurrying over the sky, like split milk blown out of the pail—altogether a wild and unpoetical scene. It is still blowing hard, the tiles flying, and the house rocking—instantaneous lightning flashing—quite a fine Swiss Alpine evening, and the sea roaring in the distance.'

February 20, 1821.

The news of the day are, that the Neapolitans are full of energy. The public spirit here is certainly well kept up. The 'Americani' (a patriotic society here, an underbranch of the 'Carbonari') give a dinner, in the Forest in a few days, and have invited me, as one of the C. It is to be in the Forest of Boccaccio's and Dryden's 'Huntsman's Ghost,' and, even if I had not the same political feelings, (to say nothing of my old convivial turn, which every now and then revives,) I would go as a poor, or, at least, a lover of poetry, to expect to see the spectacle of 'Ostasio' degli Onesti' (Dryden has turned him into Guido Cavalcanti—an essentially different person, as may be found in Dante) come 'thundering for his prey' in the midst of the festival. At any rate, whether he does or no, I will get as tipsy and patriotic as possible.

Within these few days I have read, but not written.

February 20, 1821.

'As usual, rode—visited, &c. Business begins.'
Y Tweaked The Pope was printed a declaration against the patriots. T. D. he says, meditate a rising. The consequence of all this will be, that, in a fortnight, the whole country will be up. The proclamation is not yet published, but printed, ready for distribution. * * * I was a spy, or an impostor. But be it so, even as he says. Their cannot bestow their hospitality on one who loathes and execrates them more than 1 do, or who will oppose their views with more zeal, when the opportunity offers.

February 23, 1821.

Almost ditto with yesterday—rode, &c.—visited wrote nothing—read Roman History.

Had a curious letter from a fellow, who informs me that the Barbarians are ill-disposed towards me. He is probably a spy, or an impostor. But be it so, even as he says. Their cannot bestow their hospitality on one who loathes and execrates them more than I do, or who will oppose their views with more zeal, when the opportunity offers.

February 24, 1821.

Rode, &c., as usual. The secret intelligence arrived this morning from the frontier to the C. is as bad as possible. The plan has missed—the chiefs are betrayed, military as well as civil—and the Neapolitans not only have not moved, but have declared to the P. government, and to the Barbarians, that they know nothing of the matter!!!

Thus the world goes; and thus the Italians are always lost for lack of union among themselves. What is to be done here, between the two fires, and cut off from the N. frontier, is not decided. My opinion was, better to rise than be taken in detail; but how it will be settled now, I cannot tell. Messengers are despatched to the delegates of the other cities to learn their resolutions.

I always had an idea that it would be bungled; but was willing to hope, and am so still. Whatever I can do by money, means, or person, I will venture freely for their freedom; and have so repeated to them (some of the chiefs here) half an hour ago. I have two thousand five hundred scudi, better than five hundred pounds, in the house, which I offered to begin with.

February 25, 1821.

Came home—my head aches—plenty of news, but too tiresome to set down. I have neither read, nor written, nor thought, but led a purely animal life all day. I mean to try to write a page or two before I go to bed. But, as Squire Sullen says, My head aches consumedly: Scrub, bring me a dram! Drank some Imola wine, and some punch.

February 27, 1821.

"I have been a day without continuing the log, because I could not find a blank book. At length I recollected this."

"Rode, &c.—dined—wrote down an occasional stanza for the 5th canto of D. J., which I had composed in bed this morning. Visited T. Amico. We are invited on the night of the Veglione, (next Domenica) with the Marchesa Clelia Cavalli and the Countess Spinelli Respioni. I promised to go."

Last night there was a row at the ball, of which I am a 'socié.' The vice-legate had the impudent insolence to introduce three of his servants in mask—without tickets, too! and in spite of remonstrances. The consequence was, that the young men of the ball took it up, and were near throwing the vice-legate out of the window. His servants, seeing the scene, withdrew, and he after them. His reverence Monsignor ought to know, that these are not times for the predominance of priests over decorum. Two minutes more, two steps farther, and the whole city would have been in arms, and the government driven out of it.

Such is the spirit of day, and these fellows appear not to perceive it. As far as the simple fact went, the young men were right, servants being prohibited always at these festivities.

"Yesterday wrote two notes on the Bowleye Politans, and sent them off to Murray by the post. The old woman whom I relieved in the forest (she is ninety-four years of age,) brought me two bunches of violets. 'Nan vita gaudet mortua floribus.' I was much pleased with the present. An English woman would have presented a pair of worsted stockings, at least, in the month of February. Both excellent things; but the former are more elegant. The present, at this season, reminds one of Gray's stanza, omitted from his elegy.

[^2]: Here accidents of the earliest of the year, By her death, were witnesses of violent found; The maternal lover to build and wakfe her, And little footsteps lightly print the ground."

As fine a stanza as any in his elegy. I wonder that he could have the heart to omit it.

"Last night I suffered horribly—from an indigestion, I believe. I never sup—that is, never at home. But, last night, I was prevailed upon by the Countess Gamba's persuasion, and the strenuous example of her brother, to swallow, at supper, a quantity of boiled cockles, and to dilute them, not reluctantly, with some Imola wine. When I came home, apprehensive of the consequences, I swallowed three or four glasses of spirits, which men (the venders) call brandy, rum, or Hollands, but which gods would entitle spirits of wine, colored or uncolored. All was pretty well till I got to bed, when I became somewhat swo'len, and considerably vigilant. I got out, and mixing some soda-powders, drank them. This brought on temporary relief. I returned to bed; but grew sick and sorry once and again. Took more soda-water. At last I fell into a dreary sleep. Woke, and was ill. All day, till I had galloped a few miles. Query—was it the cockles, or what I took to correct them, that caused the commotion? I think both. I remarked in my illness the complete inaction, inaction, and destruction of my chief mental faculties. I tried to rouse them, and yet could not—and this is the Soul!! I should believe that it was married to the body, if they did not sympathize so much with, each other. If the one rose, when the other fell, it would be a sign that they longed for the natural state of divorce. But, as it is, they seem to draw together like post horses.

"Let us hope the best—it is the grand possession."
DETACHED THOUGHTS.

[EXTRACTED FROM VARIOUS JOURNALS, MEMORANDUMS, &c. &c]

On the first leaf of his "Scriptores Graeci" is, in his schoolboy hand, the following memorial:—

"George Gordon Byron, Wednesday, June 25th.

A.D. 1805, three quarters of an hour past three o'clock in the afternoon third school.—Calvert, monitor, Tom Wildman on my left hand, and Long on my right. Harrow on the Hill." On the same leaf, written five years after, appears this comment:

"Ellen Fitzgerald, Pouchina! Pouchina! Labourer annal.

B. January 9th, 1809.—Of the four persons whose names are here mentioned, one is dead, another in a distant climate, all separated, and from five years have elapsed since they sat together in school and none are yet twenty-one years of age."

In some of his other school-books are recorded the date of his entrance at Harrow, the names of the boys who were at that time monitors, and the list of his fellow-pupils, under Dr. Drury, as follows:

"Byron, Harrow on the Hill, Middlesex, Alumnus Scholae Lyceumis primum in anno Domini 1801, Ellission Duce.";

"Monitors, 1801.—Ellison, Royston, Hunxman, Rashleigh, Rokeby, Leigh."

"Drury's Pupils, 1804.—Byron, Drury, Sinclair, Hoare, Bolder, Amesley, Calvert, Strong, Acland, Gordon, Drummond."

"For several years of my earliest childhood, I was in Aberdeen, but have never revisited it since I was ten years old. I was sent, at five years old or earlier, to a school kept by a Mr. Bowers, who was called 'Bodsey Bowers,' by reason of his dapperness. It was a school for both sexes. I learned little there except to repeat by rote the first lesson of Monosyllables ('God made man — Let us love him') by hearing it often repeated, without acquiring a letter. Whenever proof was made of my progress at home, I repeated these words with the most rapid fluency; but on turning over a new leaf, I continued to repeat them, so that the narrow boundaries of my first year's accomplishments were detected, my ears boxed, (which they did not deserve, seeing it was by ear only that I had acquired my letters), and my intellects consigned to a new preceptor. He was a very devout, clever little clergyman, named Ross, afterward minister of one of the kirkis, (East, I think.) Under him I made astonishing progress and I recollect to this day his mild manners and good-natured pains-taking. The moment I could read, my grand passion was history, and why I know not, but I was particularly taken with the battle near the Lake Regillus in the Roman History, put into my hands first. Four years ago, looking down upon the little round lake that was once Regillus, and which dots the immense expanses of water and wood, I remembered my young enthusiasm and my old instructor. Afterward I had a very serious, saturnine, but kind young man, named Patterson for a tutor. He was the son of my shoemaker, but a good scholar, as is common with the Scotch. He was a rigid Presbyterian also. With him I began Latin in Ruddiman's grammar, and continued till I went to the 'Grammar school' (Scotic,' Schule,' Abercouth, 'Squeal,' where I threaded all the classes of the school, with the exception of the fourth, when I was recalled to England (where I had been hatched) by the demise of my uncle. I acquired this handwriting, which I can hardly read myself, under the fair copies of Mr. Duncan, in the same city: I don't think he would plume himself much upon my progress. However, I wrote much better then than I have ever done since. Haste and agitation of one kind or another have quite applied as pretty a scratch as ever scratched over a trunk. The grammar school might consist of a hundred and fifty of all ages under age. It was divided into five classes taught by four masters, the chief teaching the fourth and fifth himself. As in England, the fifth, sixth forms, and monitors, are heard by the head masters."

"I doubt sometimes whether, after all, a quiet and unagitated life would have suited me; yet I sometimes long for it. My earliest dreams (as most boys' dreams are) were martial; but a little later, they were all for love and retirement, till the hopeless attachment to M * * C * * began and continued (though sedulously concealed) very early in my teens; and so upwards for a time. This threw me out again (alone on a wide, wide sea.) In the year 1814, I recollect meeting my sister at General Harcourt's in Portland Place. I was then one thing, and as she had always till then found me. When we met again in 1815, (she told me since,) my temper and disposition were so completely altered that I was hardly to be recognized. I was not then sensible of the change; but I can believe it, and account for it."

"In all other respects," (he says, after mentioning his infant passion for Mary Duke,) "I differed not at all from other children, being neither tall nor short, dull nor witty, of my age, but rather lively—except in my sullen moods, and then was always a devil. They once (in one of my silent rages) wrenched a knife from me, which I had snatched from table at Mrs. B.'s dinner, (I always dined earlier,) and applied to my breast;—but this was three or four years after, just before the late Lord B.'s decease."

"My ostensible temper has certainly improved in later years; but I shudder, and must to my latest..."
nor regret the consequence of it and my passions combined. One event—but no matter—there are others much better to think of also—and to whim I give the preference....

"But I hate dwelling upon incidents. My temper is by nature so easily and frequently affected, and, when I am angry, never deadly. It is when silent, and I feel my forehead and my cheek paling, that I cannot control it; and... but unless there is a woman (and not any or every woman) in the way, I have sunk into tolerable calmness."

"My passions were developed very early—so early that few would believe me if I were to state the period and the facts which accompanied it. Perhaps this was one of the reasons which caused the anticipated melancholy of my thoughts,—having anticipated life. My earlier poems are the thoughts of one at least ten years older than the age at which they were written.—I don't mean for their solidity, but their experience. The first two cantos of Childe Harold were completed at twenty; and they are written as if by a man older than I shall probably ever be.

"My first dash into poetry was as early as 1890. It was the exhibition of a passion for my first cousin, Margaret Parker, (daughter and granddaughter of the two Adaminby Parkers,) one of the most beautiful of evanescent beings. I have long forgotten the verses, but it would be difficult for me to forget her—her dark eyes—her long eyelashes—her completely Greek countenance and figure fully was then about twelve—she rather older, perhaps a year. She died about a year or two afterward, in consequence of a fall, which injured her spine, and induced consumption. Her sister Augusta (by some thought still more lovely) died of the same disease; and it was, indeed, in attending her, that Margaret met with the accident which occasioned her own death. My sister told me, that when she went to see her, shortly before her death, upon accidentally mentioning my name, Margaret colored through the paleness of mortality to the eyes, to the greatest astonishment of my sister, who (residing with her grandmother, Lady Holker, and seeing but little of me, for family reasons) knew nothing of my attachment, nor could conceive why my name should affect her at such a time. I knew nothing of her illness, being at Harrow and in the country, till she was about to die. At this, I made an attempt at an elegy—a very dull one."

"I do not recollect scarcely anything equal to the transparent beauty of my cousin, or to the sweetness of her temper, during the short period of our intimacy. She looked as if she had been made out of a rainbow—all beauty and peace.

My passion had its useful effects upon me—I could not sleep—I could not eat—I could not rest; and although I had reason to know that she loved me, it was the texture of my life to think of the time which must elapse before we could meet again—being exactly about twelve hours of separation! But I was a fool then, and am not much wiser now."

"When I was fifteen years of age, it happened that, in a cavern in Derbyshire, I had to cross a boat, (in which two people only could lie down,) a strong wind had been blowing to raise the waves, so close upon the water as to admit the boat only to be buoyed up by a ferryman (a sort of Chorion) who wades at the stern, stooping all the time. The companion of my transit was Mary Anne Chaworth, with whom I had been long in love; and, though I love her yet, though she had discovered it without me. I recollect my sensations, but cannot describe them, and it is as well. We were a party, a Mr. W., two Miss Ws. and a Miss P.; and I doubt not that C. Alas why do I say my? Our union would have healed feuds in which blood had been shed by our fathers, it would have joined lands broad and rich, it would have joined at least one heart, and two persons not ill matched in years, (she is twc years my elder,) and—and—and—what has been the result?"

"When I was a youth, I was reckoned a good actor. Besides 'Harrow Speeches,' (in which I shone,) I enacted Penriddick, in the 'Wheel of Fortune,' and Tristram Fickle in Allingham's farce of the 'Weathercock,' for three nights, (the duration of our compact,) in some private theatricals at Southwell, in 1898, with great applause. The occasional prologue for our volunteer play was also of my composition. The other performers were young ladies and gentlemen of the neighborhood, and the whole went off with great effcet upon our good natured audience."

"When I first went up to college, it was a new and a heavy-hearted scene for me: firstly, I so much disliked leaving Harrow, that though it was time, (I being seventeen,) it broke my very heart the last quarter with counting the days that remained. I always hated Harrow till the last year and a half, but then I liked it. Secondly, I wished to go to Oxford and not to Cambridge. Thirdly, I was completely alone in this new world, that it half broke my spirits. My companions were not unsocial, but the contrary—flely, hospitable, of rank and fortune, and far beyond my gaiety. I could not dwell with the degree to which I was allied with them; but, I know not how, it was one of the deadliest and heaviest feelings of my life to feel that I was no longer a boy.

"From that time forward, (he adds,) "I began to grow old in my own esteem, and in my esteem age is not estimable. I took my gradations in the vies with great promptitude, but they were not to my taste; for my early passions, though violent in the extreme, were concatenated, and hated division or spreading abroad. I could have left or lost the whole world with, or for, that which I loved; but, though my temperament was naturally burning, I could not shew the common-place hybrid of the place and time; without disgust. And yet I had very disgust, and my heart thrown back upon itself, threw me into excesses perhaps more fatal than those from which I shrank, as fixing upon one (at time) the more success which spread among my fellows would have hurt only myself."

"'Till I was eighteen years old (old as it may seem) I had never read a Review. But while at Harrow, my general information was so great on modern topics as to induce a suspicion that I could only collect so much information from Reviews, because I was never seen reading, but always lie and in mischief, or at play. The truth is that I read eating, read in bed, read when no one one was read, and had read all sorts of reading since I was five years old, and yet never met with a Review, which is the only reason I know of why I should not have read one. But it is in my recollection, when Hunter and Curzon, in 1894, told me this opinion at Harrow, I made them laugh by my ludicrous astonishment in asking them, 'What is a review?' To be sure these were then less common. In three years more, I was better acquainted with that same; but the first I ever read was in 1866-7."

"At school I was (as I have said) remarked for the extent and reading of my general information, but in all other respects idle, capable of great sudden exertions, (such as thirty or forty Greek hexameters, of course with such prosody as it pleased me,) but of nothing else. My oddities were much more oratorical and martial than poetical: and I think, my grand passion, (our head master,) had a great notion that I should turn out..."
an orator, from my fluency, my turbulence, my voice, my copiousness of declamation, and my action. I remember that my first declamation astonished him into some unwonted (for he was economical of such) and sudden compliments, before the dictionary was invented. But I afterwards rather esteemed by what I call the first Harrovian verses, (that is, English, as exercises,) a translation of vowels from the Promethus of Eschylus, were received by him but coolly. No one had the least notion of the beauty of my lines. I believe he was astonished by the first vowels of the Young, Arcite, Timon of Athens, Dante, Petrarch, an alabaster vase, lighted up within,' Satan, Shakspere, Bonaparte, Tiberius, Eschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Harlequin, the Clown, Sternhold and Hopkins, to the phantasmagoria, to Henry the Eighth, to Cheinier, to Mirabeau, to young K. Dal- las, (the schoolboy,) to Michael Angelo, to Raphael, to a petit-maitre, to Diogenes, to Childe Harold, to Lara, to the Count In Beppo, to Milton, to Pope, to Dryden, to Burns, to Savage, to Chatterton, to 'oft have I heard of thee, my Lord Biron,' in Shakspere, to Churchill, the poet, to Kean, the actor, to Alfieri, &c., &c., &c.

Thackeray, who had spoken of Alfieri was asserted very seriously by an Italian who had known him in his younger days. It of course related merely to our apparent personal dispositions. He did not assert this to me, (for we were not then good friends,) but in society.

'The object of so many contradictory comparisons must probably be like something different from them all; but what that is, is more than I know, or any body else.'

'My mother, before I was twenty, would have it that I was like Rousseau, and Madame de Stafli told me to keep it, as a secret, and stated that there is one which has endured (to be sure some have been cut short by death) till now. That with Lord Clare began one of the earliest and lasted longest—which only interrupted by distance—that I knew not was the rank of life, and station of life, and the notion of a little &c., &c., &c., &c.

'At Harrow I fought my way fairly. I think I lost but one battle out of seven; and that was to--; and the rascal did not win it, but by the unfair treatment of his own boarding-house, where we boxed--I had not even a second. I never forgave him, and I should be sorry to meet him now, as I am sure we should quarrel. My most memorable combats were with Morgan, Rice, Rainford, and Lord Jocelyn,—but we were always friendly afterward. I was a most unpopular boy, but left latterly, and have heard many of my school friendships, and all my dislikes—except to Doctor Butler, whom I treated rebelliously, and have been sorry ever since. Doctor Drury, whom I plagued sufficiently too, was the worst. He (the most strict, strict) friend I ever had—'d I look upon him still as a father.

'P. Hunter, Curzon, Long, and Tattersall, were my principal friends. Clare, Dorset, C. Gordon, De Bath, Claridge, and J. Wingfield, were my benefactors, and I spoiled by indulgence. All of us, the second, the third, the smallest, the strict, strict) friend I ever had—'d I look upon him still as a father.

'I have been thinking over, the other day, on the various comparisons, good or evil, which I have seen published of myself in different journals, English and foreign. This was suggested to me by accidently turning over a foreign one lately,—for I have made it a rule latterly never to search for any thing of the kind, but not to avoid the perilous if precocious reading sanctioned by the greatest Harrovian verses."

To begin, then: I have seen myself compared personally or poetically, in English, French, German, (as interpreted to me,) Italian, and Portuguese, with a protestant divine, a younger of the House of Commons, Pope, Milton, Pope, Shakespeare, Bonaparte, Tiberius, Eschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Harlequin, the Clown, Sternhold and Hopkins, to the phantasmagoria, to Henry the Eighth, to Cheinier, to Mirabeau, to young K. Dallas, (the schoolboy,) to Michael Angelo, Raphael, a petit-maitre, to Diogenes, to Childe Harold, to Lara, to the Count In Beppo, to Milton, to Pope, to Dryden, to Burns, to Savage, to Chatterton, to 'oft have I heard of thee, my Lord Biron,' in Shakespeare, to Churchill, the poet, to Kean, the actor, to Alfieri, &c., &c., &c.

bear the stage from a box so distant and so darkly lighted, that none of the company (composed of young and very bright-eyed people, some of them in the same box) could make out a letter, and thought it was a trick, though I had never been in that theatre before.

"Altogether, I think myself justified in thinking that, History from a book called the Alcibiades, I don't say this out of pique, for Roussseau was a great man, and the thing, if true, were flattering enough—but I have no idea of being pleased with a chimera."

"I have been thinking of an odd circumstance. My daughter, (1) my wife, (2) my half-sister, (3) my mother, (4) my sister's mother, (5) my natural daughter, (6) and myself, (7) are, or were, all only children. My sister's mother (Lady Conyers) had only my half-sister by that second marriage, (herself, too, an only child,) and my father had only me, an only child, by his second marriage with my mother, an only child too. Such a complication of only children, all tending to one family accounting singular, and I see no one who would call me a chimera."

"I have a notion (he says) that gamblers are as happy as many people, being always excited. Women, wine, cake, the table,—even ambition, late now and then; but every turn of the card and cast of the dice keep the gambler alive; besides, one can game ten times longer than one can do anything else. I was very fond of it when young, that is to say, of hazard, for I hate all card games,—even faro. When maco (or whatever they spell it) was introduced, I gave up the whole thing, for I loved and missed the rattle and dash of the box and dice, and the glorious uncertainty, not only of good luck or bad luck, but of any luck at all, as one had sometimes to throw open to design at all. I have thrown as many as four or six mains running, and carried off all the cash upon the table occasionally; but I had no coolness, or judgment, or calculation. It was the delight of the thing that pleased me. Upon the whole, I left off in time, without being much of a winner or loser. Since one-and-twenty years of age, I have played but little, and then never above a hundred, or two, or three."

"List of Historical Writers whose Works I have Consulted in Different Languages."

"Scotland. — Buchanan, Hector Botthius, both in the Latin."

"Ireland. — Gordon."

"Rom. — Hooke, Decline and Fall by Gibbon, Ancient History by Rollin, (including an account of the Carthaginians, &c.) besides Livy, Tacitus, Estrupsius, Cornelius Nepos, Julius Cesar, Arrian, Sallust."

"Greece. — Mitford's Greece, Leland's Philip Fluvare, Potter's Antiquities, Xenophon, Thucydides, Herodotus."

"France. — Mornay, Voltaire."

"Spain. — I chiefly derived my knowledge of old Spain from a book called the Aas, now obsolete. The modern history, from the intrigues of Alberone down to the Prince of Peace, I learned from its connexion with European politics."

"Portugal. — From Vertos; as also his account of the Siege of Rhodes,—though the last is his own invention, the real facts being totally different.—So much for his Knights of Malta."

"Turkey. — I have read Knolles, Sir Paul Rycaut, and Prince Cantemir, besides a more modern history, anonymous. Of the Ottoman History I know every event, from Tangrenopi, and afterward Othman L. to the peace of Passarowitz, in 1718,—the battle of Curzka, in 1739, and the treaty between Russia and Turkey, in 1790."

"Russia. — Tooke's Life of Catherine II., Voltaire's Czar Peter."

"Suede. — Voltaire's Charles XII., also Norberg's Charles XII., in my opinion the best of the two.—A translation of Schiller's Thirty Years' War, which contains the exploits of Gustavus Adolphus, besides Harte's Life of the same prince. I have somewhere, too, read an account of Gustavus Vasa, the deliverer of Sweden, but do not remember the author's name."

"Pruisia. — I have seen, at least, twenty Lives of Frederick II., the only prince worthy recording in Prussian annals. Guille, His own Works, and Thiebit, none very amusing. The last is paltry, but circumstantial."

"Denmark. — I know little of. Of Norway I understand the natural history, but not the chronological."

"Germany. — I have read long histories of the house of Babia, Wenceslaus, and, at length, Robert of Holpbury and his thick-lipped Austrian descendants."

"Switzerland. — Ah! William Tell, and the battle of Morgarten, where Burgundy was slain."

"Italy. — Properly speaking, the Guelphs and Ghibelines, the battle of Pavia, Massaniello, the revolutions of Naples, &c., &c."

"Hindostan. — Orme and Cambridge."

"America. — Robertson, Andrews' American War."

"Africa. — Merely from travels, as Mungo Park, Bruce."

"Biography. — Robertson's Charles V., Caesar, Sallust, (Catiline and Jugurtha,) Lives of Marlborough and Eugene, Tekell, Bonnard, Bonaparte, all the British Poets, both by Johnson and Anderson, Rosseau's Confessions, Life of Cromwell, British Plutarck, British Nepos, Campbell's Lives of the Admirals, Charles XII., Czar Peter, Catherine II., Henry Lord Kames, Marmontel, Teignmont's Sir William Jones, Life of Newton, Belisaire, with thousands not to be detailed."

"Law. — Blackstone, Montesquieu."

"Geography. — Strabo, Cellarius, Adams, Pinkerton, and Guthrie."

"Poetry. — All the British Classics, as before detailed, with most of the living poets, Scott, Southey, &c. Some French, in the original, of which the Cid is my favorite. Little Italian,—Greek and Latin, without number.—those last I shall give up in future, for I have translated a good deal from both languages, verse as well as prose."

"Elocution. — Demosthenes, Cicero, Quintilian, Sheridan's Chironomia, and Parliamentary Debates, from the Revolution to the year 1742."

"Divinity. — Blair, Porteus, Tillieton, Hooker,—all very tiresome. I abhor books of religion, though I reverence and love my God, without the blasphemous notions of sectaries, or belief in their absurd and damnable heresies, mysteries, and Thirty-nine Articles."

BYRON'S WORKS.

"MISCELLANIES."

"Spectator, Rambler, World, &c., &c.—Novels by the thousand."

"All the books here enumerated I have taken down from memory. I recollect reading them, and ran quote passages from any mentioned. I have, of course, omitted several in my catalogue; but the greater part of the above I received before the age of fifteen. Since I left Harrow, I have become idle and conceited, from scribbling rhyme and making love to women."

B.—Nov. 39, 1807.

"I have also read (to my regret at present) above four thousand novels, including the works of Cervantes, Fielding, Smollett, Richardson, Mackenzie, Sterne, and Rousseau, &c., &c. The book, in my opinion, most useful to a man who wishes to acquire the reputation of being well read, with the least trouble, is, 'Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy,' the most amusing and instructive medley of quotations and classical anecdotes I ever perused. But a superficial reader must take care, or his intricacies will bewilder him. If, however, he has patience to go through his volumes, he will be more improved in literature by a perusal than by the perusal of any twenty other works with which I am acquainted—at least, in the English language."

In the same book that contains the above record of his studies, he has written out, also from memory, a "List of the different poets, dramatic or otherwise, who have distinguished their respective languages by their productions." After enumerating the ancient poets, both ancient and modern, of Europe, he thus proceeds with his catalogue through other quarters of the world:—

"Arabia.—Mahomet, whose Koran contains most sublime poetical passages, far surpassing European poetry."

"Persia.—Ferdison, author of the Shah Nameh, the Persian Iliad,—Sadi, and Hafiz, the immortal Hafiz, the oriental Amurath. The last is revered beyond any bard of ancient or modern times by the Persians, who resort to his tomb, near Shiraz to celebrate his memory. A splendid copy of his works is claimed to his monument.

"America.—An epic poet has already appeared in that hemisphere, Bowlow, author of the Columbiad, not to be compared with the works of more polished nations."

"Ireland, Denmark, Norway, were famous for the Skoli Skoli. Among these Loeburg was one of the most distinguished. His Death-Song breathes romanticSentiments, but a glorious and impassioned strain of poetry."

"Ilandia is undistinguished by any great bard, at least, the Saneer is so imperfectly known to Europeans, we know not what poetical reliefs may exist."

"The Brunn Empire.—Here the natives are passionately fond of poetry, but their bards are unknown."

"China.—I never heard of any Chinese poet but the Emperor Kien Long, and his ode to Tea. What a pity their philosopher Confucius did not write poetry, with his precepts of morality!"

"Africa.—In Africa some of the native melodies are plaintive, and the words simple and affecting: but whether their rude strains of nature be classed with poetry, as the songs of the bards, the Skoli of Europe, &c., &c., I know not."

"This brief list of poets I have written down from memory, without any book of reference; consequently some errors may occur, but I think, if any, very trivial. The works of the European, and some of the Asiatic, I have perused, either in the original or translations. In my list of English, I have included only what I considered the greatest to enumerate; the minor poets would be useless, even as tedious. Perhaps Gray, Goldsmith, and Collins, might have been added, as worthy of mention, in a cosmopolite account. But as for the others, from Chaucer down to Churchill, they are 'voce et pastores nihil;' and sometimes it is of, rarely read and of no advantage. Chaucer, notwithstanding the praise bestowed on him, I think obscene and contemptible;—he owes his celebrity merely to his antiquity, which has long since served me better than I served him, or Thomas of Ercildoune. English living poets I have avoided mentioning;—we have none who will not survive their productions. Taste is over with us, and another century will crown our empire, our literature, and our name, from all but a place in the annals of mankind."

"BYRON."

"November 39, 1807."

"Knolles, Cantemir, De Tott, Lady M. W. Montague, Hawkins's Translation from Mignot's History of the Turks, the Arabian Nights, all travels, or histories, or books upon the East I could meet with, I had read, as well as Rycuat, before I was ten years old. I think the Arabian Nights first. After these, I preferred the history of naval actions, Don Quixote, and Smollett's novels, particularly Roderick Random, and I was passionate for the London Stage. In short, I could read and read, to read any poetry whatever without disgust and reluctance.

"When I belonged to the Drury-Lane Committee, and was one of the sub-committee of manage ment, the number of plays upon the shelves were about five hundred. Conceiving that among these there must be some of merit, in person and by proxy I caused an inspection of them. I do not think that of those which I saw, there was one which could be conscientiously tolerated. There never were such things as most of them! Maturin was very kindly recommended to me by Walter Scott, whom I had recourse, firstly, in the hope that he would do something for himself, and secondly, in my despair, that he would point out to us any young (or old) writer of promise. Maturin sent his Bertram and a letter without his address, so that at first I could give him no answer. When I at last hit upon his residence, I sent him a favorable answer, and something more substantial. His play succeeded; but I was at the time absent from England.

"I tried Coleridge too; but he had nothing feasible in hand at the time. Mr. Sotheby obligingly offered all his tragedies, and I pledged myself, and notwithstanding many squabbles with my committed and executed. I then met Ivan 'acceptance, but, in parts distributed. But, lo! in the very heart of the matter, upon some topicheness on the part of Kean, or warmth on that of the author, Sotheby withdrew his play. Sir J. B. Burgess did also present four tragedies and a farce, and I moved green-room and sub-committee, but they would not."

"Then the scenes I had to go through! the authors, and the authors, and the milliners, and the Irishmen,—the people from Brighton, from Blackwall, from Chatham, from Cheltenham, from Dublin, from Dundee,—who came in upon me! to all of whom it was proper to give a civil answer, and a hearing, and a reading. Having had an Irish dancing-master of sixty years, called upon me to request to play Archer, dressed in silk stockings, on a frosty morning, to show his legs, (which were certainly better than mine, and still better)—Miss Emma Somebody with a play entitled 'The Bandit of Bohemia,' or some such title or production,—Mr. O'Higgins, then resident at Richmond, with an Irish tragedy, in which the unities could not fail to be observed, for the protagonist was chained by the leg to a pillar during the chief part of the performance. He was a wild man of a salvage appearance, and the difficulty of not laughing at him was so great, I could not enumerate among the probable consequences of such cachinnation.

As I am really a civil and polite person, and do hate giving pain when it can be avoided, I sent them..."
up to Douglas Kinnaird,—who is a man of business, and sufficiently ready with a negative,—and left them to settle with him; and, as the beginning of next year I went abroad, I have since been little aware of the progress of the theatres.

"Players are said to be an impracticable people. They are so: but I managed to steer clear of any disputes with them, and escaping one debate with the elder Byrne about Miss Smith's 'pas de'—something—I forget the technicals,—I do not remember any litigation of my own. I used to protect Miss Smith, because she was like Lady Jane Harley in the face, and likeness goes a great way with me. Indeed, in general, I left such things to my more bustling colleagues, who used to repro me severely for not being able to take such things in hand without buffooning with the histrons, or throwing things into confusion by treating light matters with levity.

"Then the committee!—then the sub-committee!—we were but few, but never agreed. There was Peter Moore who contradicted Kinnaird, and Kinnaird; and I thought by the beginning of the play, than we had two managers, Rae and Dibdin; and our secretary, Ward! and yet we were all very zealous and in earnest to do good and so forth. I furnished us with prologues to our revived old English plays; but he did not go into the prologues for the sake of speaking of them as 'the Upton' of our theatre. (Mr. Upton is or was the poet who writes the songs for Astley's,) and almost gave up prologuing in consequence.

"In the pantomime of 1815-16, there was a representation of the masquerade of 1814 given by 'us youth' of Water's Club to Wellington and C. Douglas Kinnaird, and one or two others, with myself, put on masques, and went on the stage with the et παλαιον to see the effect of a theatre from the stage—it is very grand. Douglas danced among the figurants too, and they were puzzled to find out who we were, as being more than their number. It was odd enough that Douglas Kinnaird and I should have been both at the red masquerade, and afterward in the mimic one of the same, on the stage of the Drury-Lane Theatre.

"In 1812," he says, "at Middleton, (Lord Jersey's,) among a goodly company of lords, ladies, and gentlemen."

"Erskine, too! Erskine was there; good, but intolerable. He jested, he talked, he did every thing admirably, but then he would be applauded for the same thing twice over. He would read his own verses, his own paragraph, and tell his own story, again and again; and then 'the trial by jury!!!' I almost wished it abolished, for I sat next him at dinner. As I had read his published speeches, there was no occasion to repeat them to me.

"C * *, (the fox-hunter) nicknamed 'Cheek C * *,' and I, sweated the clarinet, being the only two who did so. C * *, who loves his bottle, and had no notion of matching with a 'bon vivant' in a scribbler, in making my enlougy to somebody one evening, summed it up in—By God,—he drinks like a man!

"Nobody drank, however, but C * * and I. To be sure, there was little occasion, for we swept off all what was on the table (a most splendid board, as may be supposed at Jersey's) very sufficiently. However, we carried our liquor discreetly, like the Baron of Bradwardine.

"At the opposition meeting of the Peers, in 1812, at Lord Grenville's, when Lord Grey and he read to the House their accouterments, with me Kinnaird's negotiation, sat next to the present Duke of Grafton, and said, What is so be done next?—Wake the Duke of Norfolk, (who was snoring away near us,) replied: 'I don't think the negotiators have left any thing else for us to do this turn. While Grey was speaking, turned round to me repeatedly, and asked me whether I agreed with him. It was an awkward question to me, who had not heard both sides. Moira kept repeating to me, 'It was not said.' I, therefore, now know very well what to think, but I sympathized with the acuteness of his feelings upon the subject.

"The subject of the Catholic claims was, it is well known, brought forward a second time this year by Lord Wellesley, whose motion for a futute consideration of the question was carried by a majority of one. In reference to this division, another rather amusing anecdote is thus related:—"Lord * * affects an imitation of two very different Chancellors, Thurlow and Loughborough, and can indulge in an oath now and then. On one of the debates on the Catholic question, when we were either equal or within one, (I forget which,) I had been sent for in great haste to a bull, which I quitted, I confess, somewhat reluctantly, to emancipate five millions of people. I came in late, and did not go into it at all, but stood just behind the woolsack. * * turned round, and, catching my eye, immediately said to a peer, (who had come to him for a few minutes on the woolsack, as it is the custom on his hands.)—Damn them! they'll have it now,—by God,—I the vote that is just come in will give it them.'

"When I came of age, some delays, on account of some birth and marriage certificates from Corn wall, occasioned me not to take my seat for several weeks. When these were over and I had taken the oaths, the Chancellor apologized to me for the delay, observing, 'that these forms were a part of his duty.' I begged him to make no apology, and added, (as he certainly had shown no violent hurry,) 'Your Lordship was exactly like Tom Thumb' (which was then being acted)—You did your duty, and you did many.

"I have never heard any one who fulfilled my ideal of an orator. Grattan would have been near it, but for his 'inordinate delivery.' If he had been the Fox but once, and then he struck me as a debater, which to me seems as different from an orator as an improvisatore, or a versifier, from a poet. Grey is great, but it is not oratory. Canning is sometimes very like one. Windham I did not admire, though all the world did; it seemed sad sophistry. Whitbread was the Demosthenes of bad taste and vulgar vehemence, but strong, and English. Holland is impressive from sense and sincerity. Lord Lansdowne good, but still a debater only. Grenville I like vastly, if he would prune his speeches down to an hour's delivery. Burdett is sweet and silvery as Belial himself, and I think the greatest favorite of a pandemonium; at least I always heard the country gentlemen and the ministerial devilry praise his speeches up stairs, and run down from Bellamy's when he was upon his legs. I heard Bob Milnes make his serious speeches; it made me like Ward—studied, but keen, and sometimes eloquent. Peel, my school and form-fellow, (we sat within two of each other,) strange to say, I have never heard him. I often wish to talk from what I remember of him at Harrow, he is, or should be, among the best of them. Now, I do not admire Mr. Wilberforce's speaking; it is nothing but a flow of words, words, words alone.'

"I doubt not the English debater is the least imitative, properly so called; and am inclined to think that the Irish had a great deal, ar that the French still have, and nave had, in Mirabeau. Lord Chatham and Burke are the nearest approaches to orators in England. I don't know what Erskine may have been at the bar; but in the House, I wish him at the bar once more. Lauderdale is shrill, and Cheltenham and acre.

But among all these, good, bad, and indifferent, I never heard the speech which was not too long for the subject, and not too labored except where it was and there. The whole thing is a grand deception, and as tedious and tiresome as may be to those who must be often present. I heard Sheridan only once, and that briefly, but I liked his voice, his manner, and his wit; and he is the only one of them I ever wished to hear at greater length.

"The impression of Parliament upon me was, that its members are not formidable as speakers, but very much so as an audience; because in so numerous a body there may be little eloquence, (after all, there were but two thorough orators in all antiquity, and I suspect still fewer in modern times,) but there must be a beacon of thought and good sense somewhere, if not accessible what is right, though they can't express it nobly.

"Horne Tooke and Roseee both are said to have declared that they left Parliament with a higher opinion of it, than any other abilities that with which they entered it. The general amount of both in Parliament is probably about the same, as also the number of speakers and their talent. I except orators, of course, because they are things of ages, and not of septennial or triennial reunions. Neither House ever struck me with more awe or respect than the same number of Turks in a divan, or of Methodists in a barn, would have done. Whatever difference or nervousness I felt (and I felt both in a great degree) arose from the number rather than the quality of the assemblage, and the thought rather of the public without than the persons within,—knowing (as all know) that Cicero himself, and probably the Messiah, could never have altered the vote of a single lord of the bedchamber or bishop. I thought our House dull, but the other animating enough upon great days.

"In society I have met Sheridan frequently: he was superb! He had a sort of liking for me, and never attacked me, at least to my face, and he did every body else, high names, and wits, and orators, speechless. He was also, and wisely so, a good judge. That his wit came out Whitbread, quiz Madame de Stair, amniable Colman, and do little less by some others (whose names, as I set not down) of good fame and ability. The company when he was, I thin, at Sir Gilbert Elliot's where he was as quick as ever—no, it was not the last time; the last time was at Douglas Kinnaird's.

"I have met him in all places and parties—as Whitbread with the Melbourne's, at the Marquis of Tavistock's, at Robins's the auctioneer's, at Sir Humphrey Davey's, at Sam Rogers's;—in short, in most kinds of company, and always found him very personal and delightful.

"I have seen Sheridan weep two or three times. It may be that he was mandarin; but this only renders it more impressive, for who would see

Once I saw him cry at Robins's the auctioneers, after a splendid dinner, full of great names and high company. The occasion of some sort of honor to Sheridan. The occasion of his tears was some observation or other upon the subject of the sturdiness of the Whigists resisting office, and keeping to their principles. Sheridan turned round: 'Sir, it is easy for my Lord G., or Earl G., or Marquis B., or Lord H., with thousands upon thousands a year, some of it either presently derived, or inherited in sincere or acquistions from the public money; to boast of their

2 Swift expat a deceiver and a slave!"
"When the balliff (for I have seen most kinds of life) came upon me in 1815 to seize my chattels, (being a peer of parliament, my person was beyond him,) being curious, (as is my habit,) I first asked him, where else he had for government? upon which he showed me one upon one house only for seventy thousand pounds! Next I asked him, if he had nothing for Sheridan? 'Oh —Sheridan!' said he; 'no, I have this,' (pulling out of his pocket a contract for the sale of one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco in Sheridan's house a twelvemonth at a time— a civil gentleman—knows how to deal with us,' &c., &c., &c. Our own business was then discussed, which was none of the easiest for me at that time. But the man was civil, and (what I valued more) communicative. I had met many of his brethren, years before, in affairs of my friends, (companions, that is,) but this was the first (or, second) on my own account. A civil man; fed accordingly: probably he anticipated much as much.

"I have heard that when Grattan made his first speech in the English Commons, it was for some minutes doubtful whether to laugh or to cheer. The d'80 of his predecessor Flood had been a complete failure under nearly similar circumstances. But when the ministerial part of our senators &c. watched Pitt (their thermometer) for the cue, and saw him nod repeatedly his stately nod of approbation, he looked upon the Speaker, and broke out into the most rapturous cheers. Grattan's speech, indeed, deserved it; it was a chef d'ouevre. I did not hear that speech of his, (being then at Harrow,) but heard most of his others on the same question— also that on the war of 1815. I differed from his opinions on the latter question, but coincided in the general admiration of his eloquence.

"When I met old Courtenay, the orator, at Rogers' the poet's, in 1811—12, it was much taken with the portly remains of his fine figure, and the still acute quickness of his conversation. It was he who silenced Flood in the English House by a crushing reply to a 'fusty d'80' of the rival of Grattan in Ireland. I asked Courtenay (for I like to trace motives) if he had not some personal provocation; for the accuracy of his answer seemed to me, as I had read it, to involve it. Courtenay said 'he had; that, when in Ireland, (being an Irishman,) at the bar of the Irish House of Commons, Flood had made a personal and unfair attack upon himself, who, not being a member of that House, could not defend himself, and some years afterward, the opportunity of retort offering in the English Parliament, he could not resist it.' He certainly repaid Flood with interest, for Flood never made any figure, and only spoke three or four times in all, but just after it, my poem of Childes Harold was published, and nobody ever thought about my prose afterward, nor indeed did I; it became to me a secondary and neglected object, though I sometimes wonder to myself if I should have succeeded."

"Curran! Curran's the man who struck me most. Such imagination! there never was any thing like it that ever I saw or heard of. His published life—his published speeches, give you no idea of the man—none at all. He was a machine of imagination, as some one said that Piron was an epigrammatic machine. I did not see a great deal of Curran—only in 1813; but I met him at home, (for he used to call on me,) and in society, at Mackintosh's, Holland House, &c., &c., and he was wonderful, even to me, who had seen many remarkable men of the time.

"The powers of Curran's Irish imagination were exhaustless. I have heard that man speak more poetry than I have ever seen written, — though I met him seldom and but occasionally. I saw him presented to Madame de Stael at Mackintosh's— it was the grand confluence between the Rhone and the Saone, and they were both so d—d ugly, that I could not help wondering how the best intellects of France and Ireland could have taken up respectively such residences."

"One of the cleverest men I ever knew, in conversation, was Scrope Bdermore Davies. HoUhouse is also very good in that line, though it is of less consequence to a man who has other ways of showing his talents than in company. Scrope was always ready and often witty, —Hollhouse as witty, but not always so ready, being more diffident."

"Lewis is a good man, rhymes well, (if not wisely,) but is a bore. He seizes you by the button. One night of a rout, at Mrs. Hopes', he had the most rapturous sensations upon the discovery of my symptoms of manifest distress (for I was ill,) and at last nicked a minute when neither mothers, nor husbands, nor rivals, nor gossips, were near my then idol, who was beautiful as the statues of the gallery where we stood at the time—Lewis, I say, had seized upon me by the button and the heart-strings, and spared neither. W. Spencer, who likes fun, and don't dislike mischief, saw my case, and coming up to us both, took me by the hand, and pathetically bade me farewell; 'for,' said he, 'I see it is all over with you.' Lewis then went away. Sic me serva eit Apollu."

"I remember seeing Blucher in the London assemblies, and never saw any thing of his age less venerable. With the voice and manners of a recruiting sergeant, he pretended to the honors of a hero, — just as if a stone could be worshipped because a man had stumbled over it."

"When I met Hudson Lowe, the jealous, at Lord Holland's, before he sailed for St. Helena, the discourse turned on the battle of Waterloo. I asked him whether the dispositions of Napoleon were those of a great general? He answered, disserting on them, diffusely, 'that they were very simple.' I had always thought that a degree of simplicity was an ingredient of greatness."
BYRON'S WORKS.

"I * * * was a good man, a clever man, but a bore. My only revenge or consolation used to be, setting him by the ears with some vivacious person that hated horses especially.—Madame de S—— or II, for I liked I, but was a jewel of a man, had he been better set—I don't mean personally, but less tiresome, for he was tedious, as well as contradictory to every thing and every body. Being short-sighted, when we used to ride out together near the Brenta in the twilight in summer, he made me go before, to pilot him: I am absent at times, especially towards evening; and the consequence of this pilgrimage was some narrow escapes to the former, and a ditch to the latter. Once I led him into a ditch over which I had passed as usual, forgetting to warn my convey; once I led him nearly into the river, instead of on the movable bridge which incommodes passengers; and twice did we both run against the diligence, which, being heavy and slow, did communicate less damage than it received in its leaders, who were terrifed by the charge; thrice did I lose him in the gray of the gloaming, and was obliged to bring to his distant signals of distress and distress;—all the time he went on talking without interruption, for he was a man of many words. Poor fellow! he died a martyr to his new riches—of a second visit to Jamaica.

Dark Skirmouses were alive again

"Madame de Staël was a good woman at heart, and the cleverest at bottom, but spoiled by a wish to be the new not old. In her own house she was amiable; in any other person's, you wished her gone, and in her own again.

"I liked the dandies; they were always very civil to me, though in general they disliked literary people, and persecuted and mystified Madame de Staël, Lewis, * * * *, and the like dammably. They persuaded Madame de Staël that A * * * had a hundred thousand a year, &c, &c, till she praised him to his face for his beauty! and made a set at him for * * *, and a hundred fooleries besides. The truth is, that, though I gave up the business early, I had a tinge of dandyism in my minority, and probably returned them for it to conciliate the great ones at five-and-twenty. I had gamed, and drank, and taken my degrees in most dissipations, and having no pedantry, and not being overbearing, we ran quietly together. I knew them all more or less, and they made me a member of Watier's, (a superb club at that time.) being, I take it, the only literary man (except two others, both men of the world, Moore and Spencer) in it. Our masquerade was a grand one; so was the dandy ball too, at the Argyle, but that (the latter) was given by the four chiefs, B., M., A., and P., if I err not.

"I was a member of the Alfred, too, being elected while I was in Italy; it was a very good club, and I was not then inclined to any public matters. I was a part of the Whig party, in the Commons, and of the Cambridge Whig Club; the Harrow Club, Cambridge; and one or two private clubs; Hampden (political) Club; and to the Cambridge Philosophical, &c. I saw and knew many persons; and I never stood for any other—at least to my own knowledge. I declined being proposed to several others, though pressed to stand candidate.

" * * * (commonly called by) * * * *, a very clever man, but odd; complained to our friend Scrope B Davies, in riding, that he had a stick in his side. 'I don't wonder at it,' said Scrope, 'you for rid like a tailor.' Wherever we were, * * * * * * * horse back, with his very tall figure on a small mug would not deny the justness of the repartee.

"When Brummell was obliged (by that affair of poor M * * *, who thence acquired the name of 'Dicky the Dandy-killer'—it was about money, and debt, and all that,) to retire to France, he knew no French, and having obtained a grammar for the purpose of study, our friend Scrope Davies was asked what progress Brummell had made in French; he responded, 'that Brummell had been stopped, like Bonaparte in Russia, by the Elements.'

"I have put this pun into Beppo, which is a fair exchange and no robbery,' for Scrope made his fortune at several dinners (as he owned himself,) by repeating occasionally, as his own, some of the buffooneries with which I had encountered him in the morning.'

"I have been called as mediator, or second, at least twenty times, in violent quarrels, and have always been at hand to settle the business, without compromising the honor of the parties, or leading them to mortal consequences, and this too sometimes in very difficult and delicate circumstances, and having to deal with very hot and haughty spirits. Irishmen, gamblers, guardsmen, captains, and cornets of horse, and the like. This was, of course, in my youth; when I lived in hot-headed company. I have had to carry challenges from gentlemen, and men, from captains, from lawyers to counsellors, and once from a clergyman to an officer in the life-guards; but I found the latter by far the most difficult,

The bloody duel without blows, the business being about a woman: I must add too, that I never saw a woman behave so ill, like a cold-blooded, heartless b——, as she was, but very handsomely, some for all that. A certain Susan C * * * was she called. I never saw her but once; and that was to induce her but to say two words, (which in no degree compromised herself,) and which would have the effect of saving a priest or a lieutenant of cavalry, who was neither N * * nor myself (the son of Sir E. N * * *), and a friend to one of the parties) could prevail upon her to say them, both of us used to deal in some sort with woman-kind. At last I managed to quiet the combatants without her talisman, and, I believe, to her great disappointment: she was the damndest b—— that I ever saw, and I have seen a great many. Though my clergyman was sure to lose either his life or his living, he was as warlike as the Bishop of Beauvais, and would hardly be pacified; but then he was in love, and that is a martial passion.

"Like Sylla, I have always believed that all things depend upon fortune, and nothing upon ourselves. I am not aware of any one thought or action worthy of being called good to myself or others, which is not to be attributed to the good goddess Fortune.

"If I were to live over again, I do not know what I should do in life, I am not sure I would live—no—not to have lived at all. All history, and experience, and the rest, teach us that the good and evil are pretty equally balanced in this existence and that what is most to be desired is an easy way AGED OUT OF IT. WHAT CAN IT GIVE US BUT YEARS?

"The world visits change of polities or change of religion with a more severe censure than a mere difference of opinion would appear to me to deserve. But we appear to be some reason for this feeling; — and I think it is that these departures from the earliest instilled ideas of our childhood, and from the line of conduct chosen by us when we first enter into public life, have been seen to have more mischievous effects upon the republics of society, and to prove more weakness of mind than other actions, in themselves a crime immoral."

Of the bust of himself by Bartollini:—"The bust does not turn out a good one,—though it may be like for aught I know, as it exactly resembles a superannuated Jesuit. Again, "I assure you Bartollini's is dreadful, though my mind misgives me that it is hideously like. If it is, I cannot be long for this world, for it over looks seventy."

"As far as fame goes (that is to say, living fame,) I have had my share, perhaps—indeed, certainly—more than my deserts."

"Some old instances have occurred, to my own experience, of the wild and strange places to which a name may penetrate, and where it may impress. Two years ago, (almost three, being in August or July, 1819,) I received at Ravelin a letter, in English verse, from 'Drongheim, in Norway, written by a Norwegian, and full of the usual compliments, &c., &c. It is still somewhere among my papers. In the same month I received an invitation into Holstein. Mr. Mebon (I think it was, but I am wrong,) also, by the same medium, a translation of Medora's song in the Corsair by a Westphalian baroness (not 'Thunderton-Tronck'), with some original verses of hers, (very pretty and Klopstoek-ish,) and a prose translation annexed to them, on the subject of my wife:—as they concerned her more than me, I sent them to her, together with Mr. Jacobsen's letter. It was odd enough to receive an invitation to pass the summer in Holstein, while in Italy, from people I never knew. The letter was addressed to Venice. Mr. Jacobsen talked to me of the 'wild roses' growing in the Holstein summer. Why then are there no Adbiri and Tentouma emigrants?"

"What a strange thing is love and man! Were I to present myself at the door of the house where my daughter now is, the door would be shut in my face—unless (as is not impossible) I knocked down the porter; and if I had gone in that year (and perhaps now) to Drongheim, (the farthest town in Norway,) or into Holstein, I should have been received with open arms into the mansion of strangers and foreigners, attached to me by no tie but by that of mind and rumor.

"As far as fame goes, I have had my share: it has indeed been lessened by other human contingencies, and this in a greater degree than has occurred to most literary men of a descent rank in life; but, on the whole, I take it that such equipoise is the condition of humanity."

"Among the various Journals, Memoranda, Diaries, &c., which I have kept in the course of my living, I began one about three months ago, and curried it on till I had men of a decent rank in life; (thin —thoroughly dry,) and two sheets or so of another. I then left off, partly because I thought we should have some business here, and I had furbished up my arms and got my apparatus ready for a taking of dimensions, having my drawers full of their proclamations, oaths, and resolutions, and my lower rooms of their hidden weapons, of most calibers, and partly because I had filled my paper-book.

"But the Neapolitans have betrayed themselves and all the world; and those who would have given their blood for Italy can now only give her their tears.

"Some day or other, if dust holds together, I have been enough in the secret (at least in this part of the country) to cast perhaps some little light upon the atrocious treason which has repudiated Italy into barbarism: at present I have neither the time nor the temper. However, the real Italians are not to blame; merely the soundrels at the heel of the boot, which the Hun now wears, and will trample them to ashes with for their severity. I have risked myself with the others, here, and how far I may or may not be compromised is a problem at this moment. Some of them, like Craugengelt, would tell all, and more than all, to save themselves. But, come what may, the cause was a glorious one, though it reads at present as if the Greeks had ran away from Xerxes. Happy the few who had only to reproach themselves with believing that those rascals were less 'rascaille' than they proved to be, in 1819. The efforts of the Neapolitans were necessarily limited to preparations and good intentions, until the Germans were fairly engaged in equal warfare—as we are upon their very frontiers, without a single fort or hill nearer than San Marino. What will be to them, if not to the man of 'good intentions,' I know not; but there will probably be a good store of Neapolitans to walk upon the pavements, whatever may be its composition. Shabs of lava from their mountains, with the bodies of their own damned souls for cement, would be the finest causeway for Satan's 'Corso.'"

"Pan, November 5, 1821.

"There is a strange coincidence sometimes in the little things of this world, Sancho,' says Sterne in a letter, (if I mistake not,) and I so I have often found it.

"In page 1012 of this collection, I had alluded to my friend Lord Clare in terms such as my feelings suggested. About a week or two afterward, I met him on the road between Imola and Bologna, after not having met for seven or eight years. He was abroad in 1814, and came home just as I set out in 1816.

"This meeting annihilated for a moment all the years between the present time and that of my Haltern. It was not only a never and inexplicable feeling, like rising from the grave to me. Clare too was much agitated—more in appearance than was myself; for I could feel his heart beat to his fingers' ends, unless, indeed, it was the pulse of my own which made me think so. He told me that I should find a note from him left at Bologna. I did. We were obliged to part for our different journeys, he for Rome, I for Pisa, but with the promise to come again in spring. We were but five minutes together, and on the public road; but I hardly recollect an hour of my existence which could be weighed against them. He had heard that I was coming on, and had left his letter for me. Ti fill the things he used to write to me, people with whom he was travelling could not wait longer.

"Of all I have ever known, he has always been the least altered in every respect for the better qualities and kind affections which attached me to him so strongly at school. I should hardly have thought it possible for society (or the world, as it is called) to leave a being with so little of the leaves and bad passions of bad passions.

"I do not speak from personal experience only but from all I have ever heard of him from others, during absence and distance.

"I revisited the Florence Gallery, &c. My former impressions were confirmed; but they are..."
Byron's Works.

Two new English and Spanish Atlantides will be masters of the old countries, in all probability as Greece and Europe overcame their mother Asia in the older or earlier ages, as they are called.

After saying, in reference to his own choice of Venice as a place of residence, "I remembered General Ludlow's domal description, 'Omne solum fortis patria,' and sat down free in a country which had been the school of slavery for centuries," he adds, "But there is no freedom, even for masters, in the midst of slaves. It makes my blood boil to see the thing. I sometimes wish that I was the owner of Africa, to do at once what Wilberforce will do in time, viz., sweep slavery from her deserts, and look upon the first dance of their freedom.

As to political slavery, so general, it is men's own fault: if they will be slaves, let them! Yet it is but 'a word and a blow.' See how England for merely, France, Spain, Portugal, Americas, Switzerland, freed themselves! There is no one instance of a long contest in which men did not triumph over systems. If Tyranny missers her first spring, she isewardly as the tiger, and returns to hunt.

'Going to the fountain of Delphi (Castri) in 1808, I saw a flight of twelve angels (H. says they were not, but at least, in my mind, I seized the men. On the day before, I composed the lines to Parnassus, (in Childe Harold,) and, on beholding the birds, had a hope that Apollo had accepted my homage. I have at least had the name and fame of a poet during the poetic part of life, (from twenty to thirty;) whether it will last is another matter.

In the year 1814, as Moore and I were going to dine with Lord Grey in Portman square, I pulled out a 'Java Gazette,' (which Murray had sent to me,) in which there was a controversy on our respective merits as poets. It was amusing enough that we should be procesing peacefully to the same table, while they were squabbling about us in the Indian seas, (to be sure, the paper was dated six months before,) and filling columns with Batavian criticism. But this is fame, I presume."

"One of my notions different from those of my contemporaries is, that the present is not a high age of English poetry. There are more poets (solicitous) than ever there were, and proportionally less passion excited by them. Yet, in some years, but, strange to say, it meeth not with favor from my brethren of the shelf. Even Moore shakes his head, and firmly believes that this is the grand age of British poetry."

"Of the immortality of the soul, it appears to me that there can be little doubt, if we attend for a moment to the action of mind: it is a perpetual activity. I used to doubt of it, but reflection has taught me better. It acts also so very independently of body—in dreams, for instance;—incoherently and madly, I grant you, but still it is mind, and much more than when we are awake. Now that this should not act separately, as well as jointly, who can pronounce? The stoics, Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, call the present state a soul which draws a carcass,—a heavy chain, it seems to me, that holds the body and shakes off. How far our future life will be individual, or, rather, how far it will at all resemble our present existence, is another question; but that the mind is eternal seems as probable as the body is not so. Of course, I here venture upon the question without recurrring to revelation, which, however, is at least as rational a solution of it as any other. A material resurrection seems to me so few and far between, make me feel as if talking with posterity from the other side of the Styx. In a century or two, the new English and Spanish Atlantides will be masters of the old countries, in all probability as Greece and Europe overcame their mother Asia in the older or earlier ages, as they are called."

 morning evening; and when the world is at an end, what moral or warning purpose can eternal tortures answer? Human passions have probably disfigured the divine doctrines here—but the whole thing is inscrutable.

"It is useless to tell me not to reason, but to believe. You might as well tell a man not to wake, but sleep. And then to bully with torments, and all that! I cannot help the thing that the mentioned hell makes as many devils as the severe penal codes of inhuman humanity make villains."

"Men are born passionate of body, but with an innate though secret tendency to the love of good in his main spring of mind. But, God help us all: it is at present a sad jar of atoms."

"Matter is eternal, always changing, but reproduced, and, as far as we can comprehend eternity, eternal; and why not mind? Why should not the mind act with and upon the universe, as portions of it act upon and with the congregated dust called mankind? See how one man acts upon himself and others, or upon multitudes! The same agency, in a higher and purer degree, may act upon the stars, &c., ad infinitum."

"I have often been inclined to materialism in philosophy, but could never bear its introduction into Christianity, which appears to me essentially founded upon the soul. For this reason, Priestley's Christian Materialism always struck me as deadly. Believe the resurrection of the body, if you will, but not without a soul. The dene is in it, if, after having had a soul (as surely the mind, or whatever you call it) in this world, we must part with it in the next, even for an immortal materity! I own my partiality for spirit."

"I am always most religious upon a sunshiny day, as if there was some association between an internal approach to the light and a sort of kindling of the kinder of this dark lantern of our external existence."

"The night is also a religious concern, and even more so when I viewed the moon and stars through Herschell's telescope, and saw that they were worlds."

"If, according to some speculations, you could prove the world many thousand years older than the Mosaic chronology, or if you could get rid of Adam and Eve, and the apple, and serpent, still, what is to be put up in their stead? or how is the difficulty removed? Things must have had a beginning, and what matters it when or how?"

"I sometimes think that man may be the relic of some higher material being wrecked in a former world, and degenerated in the hardship and struggle through chaos into conformity, or something like it,—as we see Laplanders, Esquimaux, &c., inferior in the present state, as the elements become more inexorable. But even then this higher pre-Adamite suppositionis creation must have had an origin; and a Creator,—for a creation is a more natural imagination than a fortuitous concourse of atoms: all things remount to a fountain, though they may flow to an ocean."

"Plutarch says, in his Life of Lysander, that Aristotle observes 'that in general great geniuses are of a melancholy turn, and instances Socrates, Plato, and Herocles, (or Heracletns,) as examples; and Lysander, though not while young, yet as in clinicd to it when approaching towards age.' Whether I am a genius or not, I have been called such by my friends as well as enemies, and in more countries and languages than one, and also within a no very long period of existence. Of my genius I can say nothing, but of my melancholy, that it is 'increasing and ought to be diminishing.' But how? "I take it that most men are so at bottom, but that it is only remarked in the remarkable. The Duchesse de Broglie, in reply to a remark of mine on the errors of clever people, said that 'they were not worse than others, only, being more in view, were more noted, especially in all that could reduce them to the rest, or raise the rest to them.' In 1816 this was. "In fact, (I suppose that) if the follies of fools were all set down like those of, the wise, the wise (who seem at present only a better sort of fools) would appear almost intelligent."

"It is singular how soon we lose the impression of what senses to be constantly before us: a year impairs, a lustre obliterates. There is little distinction left without an effort always passed. Then, indeed, the lights are rekindled for a moment; but who can be sure that imagination is not the torch-bearer? Let any man try at the end of ten years to bring before him the features, or the mind, of I have been surprised at the extreme confusion of his ideas. I speak confidently on this point, having always passed for one who had a good, ay, an excellent memory. I except, indeed, our recollection of wofulmankind; there is no a great drought,' 'the Thames frozen over,' 'the seven years' war broke out,' the 'English, or French, or Spanish revolution commenced,' 'the Lisbon earthquake,' 'the Lima earthquake,' 'the earthquake of Calabria,' 'the plague of London,' 'diti of Constantinople,' 'the sweating sickness,' 'the yellow fever of Philadelphia,' &c., &c., &c, but you don't see 'the abundant harvest,' 'the fine summer,' 'the long peace, 'the wealthy speculation,' 'the reckless voyage,' recorded so emphatically. By-the-way, there has been a thirty years' war and a seventy years' war; was there ever a seventy years' peace? Or was there ever a day's peace? except perhaps in China, where they have found out the miserable happiness of a stationary and unwarlike mediocrity. And is all this because nature is so gracious to men, as to give them no grateful? Let philosophers decide. I am none."

"In general I do not draw well with the literat men; not that I dislike them—but I never know what to say to them after I have praised their las publication. There are several exceptions, to be sure, but then they have either been men of the world, such as Scott and Moore, &c.; or visionaries out of it, such as Shelley, &c.; but your literary every-day man and I never went well in company, especially your foreigner, whom I never could abide; except Giordani, and—and—and (I really can't name any other) I don't remember a man among them whom I ever wished to see twice, except perhaps Mezzaphantil, who is a monster of Languages, the Briarbus of parts of speech, a walking Polygott, and more, who ought to have existed at the time of the Tower of Babel, as universal interpreter. He is indeed a marvel—unaccounting also. I tried him in all the tongues of which I know a single oath, (or dedication to the gods against postboys, savages, Tartars, boatmen, sailors, pilots, gondoliers, Cristianoes, camel-drivers, Vetturines, postmasters, posthorses, posthouses, post every thing,) and, egad! he astounded me—even to my English."

"No man would live his life over again; is an old and true saying which all can resolve for themselves. At the same time, there are probably moments in most men's lives which they would live over the rest of life to regain? Else why do we live at all? because Hope recurs to Memory, both false; but—but—but—but—and this but drags on till—what? I do not know: and who does? He that died o' Wednesday."

"Alcibiades is said to have been 'successful in all his battles'—but what battles? Name them! If you mention Caesar, or Hannibal, or Napoleon, you at once rush upon Pharsalia, Senna, Alesia, Can nan, Thermopylae, Troia, Lodi, Marengo, Jena, Austerlitz, Friedland, Wagram, Moskwa: but it is less easy to pitch upon the victories of Alcibiades; though they may be named too, though not so readily as the Leucra and Mantine of Epanomndas the Marathon of Miltiades, the Salamis of Themiste- nocles, and the Thermopylae of Leonidas. Yet, upon the whole, it may be doubted whether there be a name of antiquity which comes down with such a general charm as that of Alcibiades. Why? I cannot answer. Who can?"

REVIEW OF WORDSWORTH'S POEMS.

TWO VOLS., 1807.

[From "Monthly Literary Recreatons," for August, 1807.]

The volumes before us are by the author of Lyri- cal Ballads, a collection which has not undeservedly met with a considerable share of public applause. The characteristics of Mr. W.'s muse are simple and flowing, though occasionally inharmonious verse, strong, and sometimes irresistible appeals to the feelings, with unexceptionable sentiments. Though the present work may not equal his former efforts, many of the poems possess a native eleg- ance, natural and unaffected, totally devoid of the tinsel embellishments and abstract hyperboles of several contemporary sonneteers. The last son- net in the first volume, p. 152, is perhaps the best, without any novelty in the sentiments, which we hope are common to every Briton at the present crisis; the force and expression is that of a genuine poet, feeling as he writes:

"Another year! another deadly blow!
Another mighty empire overthrown!
And we are left, or shall be left, alone—
The last that dares to struggle with the foe.
The evil!—from this day forward we shall know
That in ourselves our safety must be sought,
That by our own right hands it must be wrought;
That we must stand as props, or be laid low.
O daring! whom such fortitude does not cheer!
We shall exult, if they who rule this land

Be men who hold his many blessings dear,
Wide, upright, valiant, not a vessel small,
Who are to judge of danger which they fear,
And honor which they do not ascertain.

The song at the Feast of Brougham Castle, the Seven Sisters, the Affliction of Margaret; of posses all the beauties, and few of the defects, of this writer: the following lines from the last are in his first style:

"Ah! little does the young ones dream
When full of play and childish cares,
What power both else his wildness presents,
Hearth by his mother unaware;
He knows it not, he cannot guess;
Yearns to a master being cherisht,
But do not make her love the lines."

The pieces least worthy of the author are those entitled "Moods of my own Mind." We certainly wish these "Moods" had been less frequent, or not permitted to occupy a place near works which only make their deformity more obvious; when Mr. W. ceases to please, it is by "abandoning" his mind to the most common-place ideas, at the same time clothing them in language not simple, but puerile. What will any reader or auditor, out of the nursery, say to such nymby-ramby as "Liner written at the Poot of Brother's Bridge?"

"The cock is crowing,
The stream is flowing,
The small bird twitter,
The lake doth glimmer,
REVIEW OF GELL'S GEOGRAPHY.

The green field alights in the sun; the loudest and youngest, Art at work with the strongest; the cattle are grazing, their beaks never raising, there are forty feeding like ones. Like anenny defiant, the snow hath returned, and now doth freeze still. On the top of the barn hill.

On the whole, however, with the exception of the above, and other inoffensive odes of the same description, we think these volumes display a genius worthy of higher pursuits, and regret that Mr. W. confines his muse to such trifling subjects. We trust his motto will be in future, "Paulo major canamus." Many, with inferior abilities, have acquired a stiff seat on Parnassus, merely by attempting strains in which Mr. Wordsworth is more qualified to excel.

REVIEW OF GELL'S GEOGRAPHY OF ITHACA, AND ITINERARY OF GREECE.

[From the "Monthly Review," for August, 1811.]

That laudable curiosity concerning the remains of classical antiquity which has of late years increased among our countrymen, is in no traveller or author more conspicuous than in Mr. Gell. Whatever difference of opinion may yet exist with regard to the success of the several disputants in the famous Trojan controversy, or, indeed, relating to the present author's merits as an inspector of the Troas, it must universally be acknowledged that any work, which more forcibly impresses on our imagination the scenes of heroic action, and the subjects of immortal song, possesses claims on the attention of every scholar.

Of the two works which now demand our report, we conceive the former to be by far the most interesting to the reader, as the latter is indisputably the most serviceable to the traveller. Excepting, indeed, the running commentary which it contains on a number of extracts from Pausanias and Strabo, it is, as the title imports, a mere itinerary of Greece, or rather of Argolis only, in its present circumstances. This being the case, surely it would have answered every purpose of utility much better by being printed as a pocket road-book of that part of the Morea; for a quarto is a very unmanageable travelling companion. The maps and drawings, we shall be told, would not permit such an arrangement; but as to the drawings, they are not in general to be admired as specimens of the art; and several of them, as we have been assured by eye-witnesses of the scenes which they describe, do not compensate for their mediocrity in point of execution, by any extraordinary fidelity of representation. Others, indeed, are more faithful, according to our informants. The true reason, however, for this costly mode of publication is in course to be found in a desire of gratifying the public passion for large margins, and all the luxury of typography; and we have before expressed our dissatisfaction with Mr. Gell's aristocratical mode of communicating a species of knowledge which ought to be accessible to a much greater portion of classical students than can at present acquire it by his means—but, as such expostulations are generally useless, we shall be thankful for what we can obtain, and that in the manner in which Mr. Gell has chosen to present it.

The former of these volumes, we have observed, is the most attractive in the closet. It comprehends a very full survey of the far-famed island which the hero of the Odyssey has immortalised; for we really are inclined to think that the author has established the identity of the modern Theski with the Ithaca of Homer. At all events, if it be an illusion, it is a very agreeable deception, and is effected by an ingenious interpretation of the passages in Homer that are supposed to be descriptive of the scenes which our traveller has visited. We shall extract some of these adaptations of the ancient picture to the modern scene, marking the points of resemblance which appear to be strained and forced, as well as those which are more easy and natural; but we must first insert some preliminary matter from the opening chapter. The following passage conveys a sort of general sketch of the book, which may give our readers a tolerably adequate notion of its contents:

"The present work may adduce, by a simple and correct survey of the island, coincidences in its geography, in its natural productions, and sound names, before unnoticed. Some will be directly pointed out; the fancy or memory of the reader may be employed in tracing others; the mind is satisfied with the harmony of the Odyssey will reconcile with satisfaction the scenes themselves; and this volume is offered to the public, not entirely without hope of vindicating the poem of Homer from the suspicion of those critics who imagine that the Odyssey is a mere poetical compilation, unsupported by history, and unconnected with the realities of any particular situation. Some have asserted that, in the comparison of places now existing and the descriptions of Homer, we ought not to expect coincidence in absolute details; yet it occurs only too frequently in Homer, and in an
These citations, we think, appear to justify the author in his attempt to identify the situation of his rock and fountain with the place of those mentioned by Homer. But let us now follow him in the close description of the scene.—After some account of the rock, he kindly indulges in a brief collection of inscriptions, which are

Having passed some time at the fountain, taking a drawing, and made the necessary observations on the situation of the point, we proceeded to an examination of the precipice, climbing over the terraces above the source, among shady fig-trees, which, however, did not prevent us from feeling the powerful effects of the midday sun. After a short last lingering around, we arrived at the rock, which extends in a vast perpendicular semicircle, beautifully fringed with trees, sitting to the south-east. Under the crape we found a large extra fixture of stones. When the sun, at the moment of sunset, the contrast between the broad mass of rocks, is seen in the view of the fountain. They are still the resort of shepherds and goats, and in one of them are small natural precipices for the water, covered by vegetation and moss.

These caves, being at the extremity of the curve formed by the precipice, open toward the south, and present us with another accommodation to the front of Arethusa. As the sun then set at the fountain, so it is necessary that a source should be found in this vicinity; and this source to supply, to illustrious situations, with that of the Poet. Near the source also was the fold or stadia of Eumaeus, for the goddess informs Ulysses that he should find his faithful servant at this situation.

Now the hero meets the sneurheus close to the fold, which was consequently very near that source. At the top of the rock, and just above the spot where the waterfalls about the precipice, is at this day a stag and pastoral dwelling, which the hermits of Ithaca still inhabit, on account of the water necessary for their sustenance. One of these people walked on the verge of the precipice at the time of our visit to the place, and seemed so anxious to know how we had been conveyed to the spot, that his enquiries reached us as a question probably not uncommon in the days of Homer, who more than once represents the Ithacans demanding of strangers who ship had brought them to the island, it being evident they could not come on foot. He told us that there, on the summit where he stood, a small herd of goats now grazes. It is possible also wolves of ancient habitations, and the place is now called Anemeneu.

Convent-ace, as well as safety, seems to have pointed out the left position of the precipice at a fine fit place for the rock, and also part of the island from the earliest ages. A small source of water is a treasure in these climates; and if the inhabitants of Ithaca now select a ragged and elevated spot, to secure them from the rebels of the Echinades, it is to be recommended. The Tropaeum plates were found near this place, even in the days of Ulysses, and that residence in the solitary part of the island, far from the furtive, and close to a celebrated fountain, most at all times have been dangerous, without some security as the rocks of Korax. Indeed, there can be no doubt that the house of Eumaeus was on the top of the precipice: for Ulysses, in order to evince the truth of his story to the absent, desires to be thrown from the summit if his narrative does not prove correct.

Near the bottom of the precipice is a curious natural gallery, about seven feet high, which is expressed in the globe. It may be fairly presumed, from the very remarkable coincidence between this place and the Homeric account, that this was the same designated by the poet as the fountain of Arethusa, and that the rock, the precipice about the fountain, and theフェオ of the Aetna, must be considered the spot which bears this name, at this day, so strong a resemblance to a peculioc description composed at a period so very remote. There is no other fountain in this part of the world, nor any rock which bears the slightest resemblance to the Korax of Homer.

The situation of the good Eumaeus appears to have been little different, for he was not twice in the valley, but killed from the top of the rock. The poet expressly mentions that other hermits drove their flocks into the city at summer, as custom which still prevails throughout Greece during the summer, and which is not in use in which Ulysses was told to leave his sheep. Homer accounts for this deviation from the prevailing custom, by observing that he had retired from this city to avoid the authors of Pentepelee. These trifling omissions only prove a strong presumption that the islands of Homer was something more that the creation of his own fancy, as Homer has given it.

Sweet sources. Does Mr. Gell translate from the Latin? To avoid similar cause of mistakes, μερικαί should not be rendered severally, but greats, as Barrows has given it.
We must, however, observe that "demonstration is a strong term. In his description of the Lycadian Promontory (of which we have a pleasing representation in the plate), he remarks that it is "celebrated for the leap of Sappho, and the death of Artemisia." From this variety in the expression, a reader would hardly conceive that both the ladies perished in the same manner; in fact, the sentence is as true for one as it would be for the other. We cannot conclude the death of Russell, and the death of Sidney. The view from this promontory includes the island of Corfu; and the name suggests to Mr. Gell the following note: even though rather irrelevant, it is of a curious nature, and we therefore conclude our citations by transcribing it:—

"It has been generally supposed that Corfu, or Corcyra, was the Phœnician Homer; but the history of the place is too inconsistent with the voyage of Ulysses as described in the Odyssey. That gentleman has also observed a number of remarkable coincidences between the courts of Alcmena and Solomon, that they may be thought curious and interesting. Homer was familiar with the names of Tyre, Sihon, and Egypt; and, as we lived about the time of Solomon, it would not have been extraordinary if he had introduced some account of the magnificence of that prince into his poem. As Alcmena was famous for her magnificence, so, to the name of Alcmena according to our knowledge; as the goddess of Solomon were celebrated, as we are those of Alcmena (Od. 7, 112); as the kingdom of Solomon was distinguished by its riches under twelve princes (1 Kings, ch. 4), so that of Alcmena was invested with a shower of gold (1 Kings, ch. 10), so that of Alcmena was placed on dogs of silver and gold (1. Kings, 7. 41); as the name of Solomon was famous, so was that of Alcmena. It is a matter of great curiosity, that in the case of the Stylises, as he returned from Ethiopia to Ephesus, while he rolled the temple which these Ulisses on the coast of Phœnicias; that the Stylises of Phœnicia are very considerably distant from the sea. This magnificent character, also, which Nausicaæ attributes to her countryman agrees precisely with that which the Greek and Roman gave of the Jews."

The seventh chapter contains a description of the Monastery of Kthara, and several adjacent places. The eighth, although of other curiosities, fixes on one imaginary site for the farm of Laertes: but this is the agony of conjecture, indeed—and the ninth chapter mentions another Monastery, and a rock still called the school of Homer. Some sepulchral inscriptions of very simple nature are also published. The tenth and last chapter brings us round to the Port of Schoenus, near Bath; after we have completed, seemingly in a very minute and accurate manner, the tour of the island. We can certainly recommend a perusal of this volume to every lover of classical scene and story. We may indulge the pleasing belief that Homer sang of a real kingdom, and that Ulisses governed it, though we do not feel any feeling of pleasing confidence in the chain of evidence, we are on the whole inclined to fancy that it is the Ithaca of the bard and of the monarch. At all events, Mr. Gell has enabled every future traveller to form a clearer idea of Homer; a question than he could have established without such a "Vade-mecum to Ithaca," or a "Have with you, to the House of Ulisses," as the present With Homer in his pocket, and Gell on his understand the true scenes of the Odyssey. For ourselves, we confess that all our old Grecian feelings would be alive on approaching the fountain of Melanippe, the fountain of the Virgin, the fountain of the priests relate, Homer was restored to sight. We now come to the "Grecian Patterson," or "Carly," which Mr. Gell has begun to publish: and really he has cast his eyes on the whole, while we consider the person of the author as to great a length as either of the above-mentioned heroes of literary history. We hear nothing of his "hair-brush 'scapes" by sea or land; and we do not even know, for the greater part of his journey through Arcolis, whether he relates what he has seen or what he has heard. From other parts of the book, we find the former to be the case; but, though there have been tourists and "strangers" in other countries, who have kindly permitted their readers to learn rather too much of their sweet selves, yet it is possible to carry delicacy, or cautious silence, or whatever it may be called, without any excess. We think that Mr. Gell has fallen into this error, so opposite to that of his numerous brethren. It is offensive, indeed, to be told what a man has eaten for dinner, or in what pathetic he was on certain occasions; but we like to think that there is a man yet living who describes the scenes to which he introduces us; and that is not a mere translation from Strabo or Pausanias which, we are reading, or a commentary on those authors. This is one loss which the concluding remark in Mr. Gell's preface (by much the most interesting part of his book) to his Itinerary of Greece, in which he thus expresses himself:

"The confusion of the modern with the ancient names of places in this volume is absolutely inevitable, they are, however, mentioned in such a manner as to guard against the possibility of the inconvenience of them. The necessity of applying the ancient appellations to the different scenes, will to extirpate the total ignorance of the public on the subject of the modern names, which, having never appeared in print, are only known to the modern investigators to have existed the classical names.

"What could appear less familiar to the reader, or less useful to the traveller, than a route from Caesar and Strabo to Roudasfrom, from Homer, to Percin and the mills of Perci, while every one is so degree acquainted with the names of Stympaha, Nemea, Mycena, Lyciea, Lerna, and Tegoa?"

Although this may be very true inasmuch as it relates to the reader, yet to the traveller we must observe, in opposition to Mr. Gell, that nothing can be more indecent, or dishonorable, than the illusion or misrepresentation of his route according to the ancient names. We might as well, and with as much chance of arriving at the place of our destination, talk to a Hounslow postboy about making haste to Augustus, as apply to our Turkish guide in modern Greece for a direction to Stympaha, Nemea, Mycena, &c., &c. This is neither more nor less than classical affectation; and it renders Mr. Gell's book of much more confined use than it would otherwise have been;—but we have some other and more important remarks to make on his general directions to Grecian tourists; and we beg leave to assure our readers that they are derived from travellers who have lately visited Greece. In this respect, Mr. Gell is absolutely incompetent to recommend an interference on the part of English travellers with the Minister at the Porte, in behalf of the Greeks. "The folly of such neglect (page 10, preface), in many instances, where the emancipation of a district might often be obtained by the present of a snuff-box or a watch, at Constantinople, and without the slightest danger of exciting the jealousy of such a court as that of Turkey, will be acknowledged when we are no longer able to rectify the error." We have every reason to believe, on the contrary, that the folly of half a dozen travellers taking this advice, might bring us into a war. "No traveller interferes with any thing of the kind," is a much sounder and more political suggestion to all English travellers in Greece.

Mr. Gell apologises for the introduction of "his panoramic drawings," as he calls them, on the score of the great difficulty of giving any tolerable idea of the face of a country in writing, and the ease with which a very accurate knowledge of it may be acquired by maps and panoramic designs. We are inclined to think that is not the case with such designs. The small scale of the single map we have already censured: and we have hinted that some of the drawings are not remarkable for correct resemblance, and that their original designs of the Gate of the Lions at Mycena are indeed good likenesses of their subject, and the first of them is unusually well executed; but the general view of Mycena is not more than tolerable in any respect: and the prospect of Laussa, &c., is bare equal to the former. The view from this last place is also indifferent; and we are positively assured that there are no windows at Naplina which look like a portrait. The view suggested by Mr. Gell's plate. We must not, however, be too severe on these picturesque bagatelles, which, probably, were very hasty sketches; and the circumstances of weather, &c., may not quite so ignorant; or several of our Grecian Mango Parks have travelled in vain, and some very sumptuous works have been published to no purpose! As we proceed, we find the author observing that "Athens is now the most polished seat of Greece," when we believe it to be the most barbarous, even to a proverb—

"Αθήνα, πρωτόχορα,
Το γαλάζιο ράφτει τον.

is a couplet of reproach now applied to this once famous city; whose inhabitants seem little worthy of the inspiration when suggested by strangers. They have been within these twenty years, by the celebrated Riga—

Δεύτε πάντες τοὺς Ἐλλήνους— π. λ.

Lamiana, the capital of Epirus, and the seat of Ali Pacha's government, is in truth deserving of the same estimation. We no longer respect the honour of his dominions, we have heard, from the destruction of the Palais, and the pillage of the capital. As to the correctness of the remark concerning the fashion of wearing the hair cropped in Molasia, as Mr. Gell informs us, our authorities cannot dispute: but why will he use the classical term of Eleusinian images, when that people are so much better known by their modern name of Mainotes? "The court of the Pacha of Tripolizza" is said "to realise the splendid visions of the Arabian Nights." This is true with regard to the court: but surely the traveller ought to have added that the city and palace are most miserable, and form an extraordinary contrast to the splendid of the court.—Mr. Gell mentions gold mines in Greece; he should have specified their situation, as it certainly is not universally known. When, also, he remarks that "the first article of necessity in Greece is a firman, or order from the Sultan, permitting the traveller to pass unmolested to the interior of the Grecian dominions in which a firman is not necessary; since the passport of the Pacha is absolute within his territory (according to Mr. G.'s own admission), and much more effectual than a firman "Money," he remarks, "is easily procured at Sa lonica, or Patras, where the English have consuls. It is not much inferior in the case of the Turkish governors, who never charge discount. The consuls for the English are not of the most magnanimous order of Greeks, and far from being so liberal, generally speaking; although there are, in course of some exceptions, and Strune of Patras has been more honorably mentioned. After having observed that "horses seem the best mode of conveyance in Greece," Mr. Gell proceeds: "Some English travellers would not travel in Greece without the saddle of this sort is always objected to the owner of the horse, and not without reason," &c. This, we learn, is far from being the case; and, indeed, for a great many of the two near species of these horses seem to be pretable to one of the country, because

* We write these lines from the conclusion of the travellers by sea we have alluded; but we cannot vouch for the correctness of the Itinerary.
't is much lighter. When, too, Mr. Gell calls the position "Menzilgi," he mistakes him for his betters; Serrutiecs are postilions; Menzilgis are postmasters:—Our traveller was fortunate in his Turks, who are hired to walk by the side of the baggage-horses. They "are certain," he says, "of performing their engagement without grumbling." We apprehend that this is by no means certain—but Mr. Gell is perfectly right in preferring a Turk to a Greek for this purpose; and in his general recommendation to take a Janissary on the tour: who, we may add, should be suffered to act as plebeys, since nothing is to be done by gentle means, or even by offers of money, at the places of accommodation. A courier, to be sent on before to the place at which the traveller intends to sleep, is indispensable to comfort: but no tourist should be misled by the author's advice to suffer the Greeks to gratify their curiosity, in permitting them to remain for some time about him on his arrival at an inn. They should be removed as soon as possible; for, as to the remark that "no stranger would think of intruding when a room is preoccupied," our informants were not so well convinced of that fact.

Though we have made the above exceptions to the accuracy of Mr. Gell's information, we are most ready to do justice to the general utility of his directions, and can certainly concede the praise which he is desirous of obtaining,—namely, of having facilitated the researches of future travellers, by affording that local information which was before impossible to obtain." This book, indeed, is absolutely necessary to any person who wishes to explore the Morea advantageously; and we hope that Mr. Gell will continue his Itinerary over that and every other part of Greece. He allows that his volume "is only calculated to become a book of reference, and not of general entertainment;" but we do not see any reason against the compatibility of both objects in a survey of the most celebrated country of the ancient world. To that country, we trust, the attention, not only of our travellers, but of our legislators, will hereafter be directed. The greatest caution will, indeed, be required, as we have promised, in touching on so delicate a subject as the amelioration of the possessions of an ally: but the field for the exercise of political sagacity is wide and inviting in this portion of the globe; and Mr. Gell, and all other writers who interest us, however remotely, in its extraordinary capabilities, deserve well of the British empire. We shall conclude by an extract from the author's work, which, even if it fails of exciting that general interest which we hope most earnestly it may attract, towards its important subject, cannot, as he justly observes, "be entirely uninteresting to the scholar:" since it is a work "which gives him a minute description of the remains of cities, the very existence of which was doubtful, as they perished before the era of authentic history." The subjoined quotation is a good specimen of the author's minuteness of research as a topographer; and we trust that the credit which must accrue to him from the present performance will ensure the completion of his library:

The Incompleteness of the Maps of Apanapheus are in many respects very glaring. The situation of Paphi is marked by Serrutiecs as surrounded by the remains of Smyrna, Argos, Chalcis, and Smyrion. Mr. Heraldis, observed, that Paphi, the ruins of which still exist near Agioi Gorgones, lie in a direct line between Chalcis and Smyrion and another from Beyan in Argos; so that Serrutiecs was correct in marking it by between these two towns; yet we see Paphi, in the map of Argos by M. D'Anville, placed ten miles to the north of Smyrion, indicating both history and fact. D'Anville is guilty of the same error.

M. de Boisage places a town named Phasion, by him Phis, and our researches, on the point of land which forms the port of Deepassis; there we are not at present sure to find it. The maps of D'Anville are generally more correct than any others where ancient geography is concerned. A mistake occurs on the subject of Tyrrenus, and a place named by him Yachin, but of which nothing can be understood. It is possible that Yathud or the profound valley, may be a name sometimes used for the valley of Beisachi, and thus the place named by D'Anville Chalaur may be the result of that valley called Klesos, which has a corresponding signification.

The city of Tyrrenus is also placed in two different positions, once by its Greek name, and again as Tyrrheus. The mistake between the labours of D'Anville and Colonna has been noticed in page 152. The Phereus, which D'Anville represents as a river, and the Euranion are equally placed in his map. There was a place called Cressopulis, somewhere toward Cys Qoros; but its situation is not exactly fixed. The ports called Baruthum and Phereus seem to have been nothing more than little bays in the country between Corinth and Epidauros. The town called Athenes, in Cys Qoros, by Pausanias, is called Athens by Thucydides, book 5: 47.
THE FIRST CHAPTER OF A NOVEL

CONTEMPLATED BY LORD BYRON IN THE SPRING OF 1812

[AFTERWARDS PUBLISHED IN ONE OF MR. DALLAS’S NOVELS.]

— DARRELL TO G. Y. —

So much for your present pursuits. I will now resume the subject of my last. How I wish you were upon the spot; your taste for the ridiculous would be fully gratified; and if you felt inclined for more serious amusement, there is no "lack of argument." Within this last week our garden has been blest; and, if some of your old acquaintances. Our host you already know — absurd as ever, but rather duller, and I should conceive, troublesome to such of his very good friends as find his house more agreeable than its owner. I confine myself to observation, and do not find him at all in the way, though Veramore and Aspyn are of a different opinion. The former, in particular, imparts to me many pathetic complaints of the want of opportunities (nothing else being wanting to the success of the said Veramore) created by the fractions and but ill-concealed jealousy of poor Bramblebear, whose Penelope seems to have as many suitors as her namesake, and for aught I can see to the contrary, with as much prospect of carrying their point. In the mean time, I look on and laugh, or rather I should laugh were you present to share in it; sackcloth and sorrow are excellent wear for soliloquy; but for a laugh there should be two, but not many more, except at the first night of a modern tragedy.

You are very much mistaken in the design you impitate to myself; I have none here or elsewhere. I am sick of old intrigues, and too indolent to engage in new ones. Besides, I am, that is, I used to be, apt to find my heart gone at the very time when you fastidious gentlemen begin to recover yours. I agree with you that the world, as well as yourself, are of a different opinion. I shall never be at the trouble to undeceive either; my follies have seldom been of my own seeking. "Rebellion came in my way, and I found it." This may appear as coaxing I deal a speech as Veramore could make, yet you partly know its truth. You talk to me too of "my character," and yet it is one which you and fifty others have been struggling these seven years to obtain for yourselves. I wish you had it, you would make so much better, that is, worse use of it; relieve me, and gratify an ambition which is unworthy of a man of sense. It has always appeared to me extraordinary that you should value women so highly, and yet love them so little. The height of your gratification ceases with its accomplishment; you bow, and you sigh, and you worship,—and abandon. For my part I regard them as a very beautiful, but inferior animal. I think them as much out of place at our tables as they would be in our senate. The whole present system, with regard to that sex, is a remnant of the chivalrous barbarism of our ancestors; I think it much better; and grown-up children, but, like a foolish mam, am always the slave of some only one. With a contempt for the race, I am ever attached to the individual. You know that, though not rude, I am inattentive; any thing but a "beau garçon." I would not hand a woman out of her carriage, but I would leap into a river after her. However, I grant you last, as they must walk offener out of chariots than into the Thames, you gentlemen servitors, Cortezos and Ciesebai, have a better chance of being agreeable and useful; you might, very probably, do both; but as you can't swim, and I can, I recommend you to invite me to your first water-party.

Bramblebear's Lady Penelope puzzles me. She is very beautiful, but not one of my beauties. You know I admire a different complexion, but the figure is perfect. She is accomplished, if her mother and music-master may be believed; amiable, if a soft voice and a sweet smile could make her so; young, even by the register of her baptism; pious and chaste, and doting on her husband, according to Bramblebear's observation; equally loving, not of her husband, though rather less pious, and other thing, according to Veramore's; and if mine hath any discernment, she detests the one, despises the other, and loves—herself. That she dislikes Bramble is evident; poor soul, I can't blame her; she has found him out to be mighty weak and little-tempered; she has also discovered that she married too early to know what she liked, and that there are many likeable people who would have been less discordant and more creditable partners. Still, she conducts herself well, and in point of good humor, to admiration. A good deal of religion, (not enthusiasm, for that leads the contrary way,) a prying husband who never leaves her, and, as I think, a very temperate pulse, will keep her out of scraps. I am glad of it, first, because, though Bramblebear is bad, I don't think him bad; I much better; and next, because Bramblebear is ridiculous enough already, and it would be thrown away upon him to make him more so; thirdly, it would be a pity, because nobody would pity him; and, fourthly, (as Scrub says,) he would then become a melancholy and sentimental harlequin, instead of a merry, fretful pantaloon, and I like the pantomime better as it is now cast. More in my next.

Yours, truly,
DARRELL.
DEBATE ON THE FRAME-WORK BILL, IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, FEBRUARY 27, 1812.

The order of the day for the second reading of this bill being brought before the House.

LORD BYRON rose, and (for the first time) addressed their lordships, as follows:

MY LORDS—The subject now submitted to your lordships for the first time, though new to the House, is by no means new to the country. I believe it had occupied the serious thoughts of all descriptions of persons, long before its introduction to the notice of that legislature, whose interference alone could be of real service. As a person in some degree connected with the suffering county, though a stranger not only to this House in general, but to almost every obvious part of the measures on this subject, I must claim some portion of your lordships' indulgence whilst I offer a few observations on a question in which I confess myself deeply interested.

To enter into any detail of the riots would be superfluous: the House is already aware that every outrage short of actual bloodshed has been perpetrated, and that the proprietors of the frames obnoxious to the rioters, and all persons supposed to be connected with them, have been liable to insult and violence. During the short time I recently passed in Nottinghamshire, not twelve hours elapsed without some fresh act of violence; and on the day I left the county, I was informed that forty frames had been broken the preceding evening, as usual, without resistance and without detection.

Such was then the state of that county, and such I have reason to believe it to be at this moment. But whilst these outrages must be admitted to exist to an alarming extent, it cannot be denied that they have arisen from circumstances of the most unparalleled distress. The perseverance of these miserable men in their proceedings, tends to prove that nothing but absolute want could have driven a large, and once honest and industrious, body of the people, into the commission of excesses so hazardous to themselves, their families, and the community. At the time to which I allude, the town and county were burdened with large detachments of the military; the police was in motion, the magistrates assembled; yet all the movements, civil and military, had led to—nothing. Not a single instance had occurred of the apprehension of any real delinquent actually taken in the fact, against whom there existed legal evidence sufficient for conviction. But the police, however useless, were by no means idle: several notorious delinquents had been detected; men, liable to conviction, on the clearest evidence, of the capital crime of poverty; men who had been notoriously guilty of lawfully beggaring several children, whom, thanks to the times! they were unable to maintain. Considerable injury had been due to the proprietors of the improved frames.

These machines were to them an advantage, inasmuch as they superseded the necessity of employing a number of workmen, who were left in consequence to starve. By the adoption of one species of frame in particular, one man performed the work of many, and the superfluous laborers were thrown out of employment. Yet it is to be observed, that the work thus executed was inferior in quality; not marketable at home, and merely hurried over with a view to exportation. It was called, in the cant of the trade, by the name of "Spider work." The rejected workmen, in the blindness of their ignorance, instead of rejoicing at these improvements in arts so beneficial to mankind, conceived themselves to be sacrificed to improvements in mechanism. In the foolishness of their hearts they imagined, that the maintenance and well-doing of the industrious and their obtrusive persons were to solicit, must claim some portion of your lordships' indulgence whilst I offer a few observations on a question in which I confess myself deeply interested.

occupied and their excesses, however to be deplored and condemned, can hardly be subject of surprise. It has been stated that the persons in the temporarily of Emerick at their arrest; if this be proved upon inquiry, it was necessary that such material accessories to the crime should be principals in the punishment. But I am informed by an agent of his majesty's government, for your lordship's decision, would have had conciliating for its basis; or, if that were hopeless, that some previous inquiry, some deliberation would have been deemed requisite, and not have been called at once without examination, and without cause, to pass sentences by wholesale, and sign death-warrants biliously.

But admitting that these men had no cause of complaint; that the grievances of them and their employers were alike groundless; that they deserve the worst; what inefficiency, what imbecility has been evinced in the method chosen to reduce them? Why were the military called out to set down to check our foreign triumphs in the midst of all? As far as the difference of seasons would permit, they have merely parodied the summer campaign of Major Sturgeon; and, indeed, the whole proceedings of the military, are a caricature of the proceedings of those of the Mayor and corporation of Garratt.

--Such marching and countermarchings! from Nottingham to Bullwell, from Bullwell to Banford, from Banford to Mansfield! and when at length the developments arrived at their destinations--fan in all "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," they came just in time to witness the mischief which had been done, and ascertain the escape of the perpetrators, to collect the 'police opus' from the fragments of broken frames, and return to their quarters amidst the derision of old women, and the hootings of children. Now, though in a free country, it is wished that our military should never be too formidable, at all events, I cannot see the policy of placing them in situations where they can only be made ridiculous. As the sword is the worst argument that can be used, so should it be the last. In this instance it has been the first; but provisionally as yet only in the scabbard. The present measure will, indeed, pluck it from the sheath; yet had proper meetings been held at the earlier stages of these riots,—had the grievances of these men and their masters (for they also had their grievances) been fairly weighed and justly examined, I do think that means might have been devised to restore the workmen to their avocation, though that of the prison. At present the country suffers from the double indiction of an idle military, and a starving population. In what state of apathy have we been plunged so long, that for the first time the House has been officially apprised of these disturbances! All this has been transacting within one hundred and thirty miles of London, and yet we, "good easy men, have deemed full surely our greatness was a-ripening," and have sat in the midst of domestic calamity. But all the cities you have taken, all the armies which have retreated before your leaders, are but paltry subjects of self-congratulation. You are aware of our grievances; and your droogs and your executioners must be let loose against your fellow-citizens. You call these men a mob, desperate, dangerous, and ignorant; and seem to think that the only way to quiet the "Bellum multorum capitum" is to lop off a few of its superfluous heads. But even a mob may be better reduced to reason by a mixture of conciliation and firmness, than by additional irritation and redoubled penalties. You are aware of our grievances; and your droogs and your executioners must be let loose against your fellow-citizens. You call these men a mob, desperate, dangerous, and ignorant; and seem to think that the only way to quiet the "Bellum multorum capitum" is to lop off a few of its superfluous heads. But even a mob may be better reduced to reason by a mixture of conciliation and firmness, than by additional irritation and redoubled penalties. The Army is a mob, and the Army's officers are military police, and you can never get an Army man to be a mob.

The people's mob too often speaks the sentiment of the people. And here I must remark, with what alacrity you are accustomed to fly to the succor of ye or distressed ye country's allies, in the midst of the care of Providence, or the parish. When the Portuguese suffered under the retreat of the French, every arm was stretched out, every hand was opened, every pocket was empty of its contents, all was bestowed to enable them to rebuild their villages and replenish their granaries. And at this moment, when thousands of misguided but most unfortunates fellow-countrymen are struggling with the calamity, those extremities, we have already begun abroad, it should end at home. A much less sum, a tithe of the bounty bestowed on Portugal, even if those men (which I cannot a limit without inquiry) could not have been restored to their employments, would have rendered unnecessary the tender mercies of the bayonets and the gibbet. But doubtless our friends have too many foreign claims to admit a prospect of domestic relief; though never did such objects demand it. I have traversed the seat of war in the Peninsula, I have been in some of the most oppressed provinces of Turkey, but never under the most despot of infidel governours have I seen the death-bill of the unfortunates have seen since my return in the very heart of a Christian country. And what are your remedies? After months of inaction, and months of action worse than inactivity, at length comes forth the grand specious, the never-failing panoply of the state physicians, from the days of D roc to the present time. After feeling the pulse and shaking the head over the patient, prescribing the usual course of warm water and cold, the warm water of you maudish police, and the lancets of your military, these convulsions must terminate in death, the sure consummation of the prescriptions of all political surgeons. And the country, and the certain inefficiency of the bill, are there not capital punishments sufficient in your statutes? Is there not blood enough upon your penal code, that more must be poured forth to ascend Heaven and testify against you? How will you carry the bill into effect? Can you commit a whole county to their own prison? Will you erect a gibbet in every field, and hang up men like scarecrows? or will you proceed, if you must, to bring this measure into (effect) by decimation? place the country under martial law? depopulate and lay waste all around you? and restore Sherwood Forest as an acceptable gift to the crown, in its former condition of a royal chase and desolate? At present, I think, the country is in want of something to fill the place of the country is in want of something to fill the place of those remedies for a starving and desperate populace? Will the vanquished wretch who has braved your bayonets, be appalled by your gibbets? When death is a relief, and the only relief it appears that you will afford him, will he be dragooned into tranquillity? Will that which could not be effected by your grenadiers be accomplished by your executioners? If you proceed by the forms of law, where is your evidence? Those who have refused to impeach their accomplices, when transportation only was the punishment, will hardly be tempted to witness against them when death is the penalty. With all due deference to your wisdom, I think a little investigation, some previous inquiry, would induce even them to change their purpose. That most favorite state measure, so marvellously efficacious in many and recent instances, law, meaning, would not be without its advantages in this case. When a proposal is made to emancipate or relieve, you hesitate, you deliberate for years, you temperize and tamper with the minds of men; but a death-bill must be off hand, without a thought of the consequences. Sure I am, from what I have heard, and from what I have seen, that to pass the Bill under all the existing circumstances, without inquiry, without deliberation, without the slightest regard for the lạc or neglect simplicity, will be the presentation of a case and barbarity to neglect. The framers of such a Bill must be content to inherit the honors of
The enemy is without, and distress within. It is too late to call in doctrinal points, when we must use in defiance of things more important than the mere controversies of this troublesome age. It is too late to say that we are called together to deliberate, not on the God we adore, for in that we are agreed; not on the king we obey, for to him we are loyal; but how far the Catholic church in Ireland, and the churchmen, who believe not too little, but too much, (the worst that can be imputed to the Catholics,) how far too much devotion to their God, may incapacitate our fellow-subjects from effectually serving their king.

Much has been said, within and without doors, of Church and State, and although those venerable words have been oft a prostituted to the most despicable of party uses, we can see them oftener than is well; all, I presume, are the advocates of Church and State, the Church of Christ, and the State of Great Britain; but not a state of exclusion and despotism; not an intolerant church; not a church militant, which renders itself liable to the very objection urged against the Romish communion, and in a greater degree, for the Catholic merely withholding its spiritual benediction, (and even that is done by our church, or rather our churchmen, not only refuse to the Catholic their spiritual grace, but all temporal blessings whatsoever. It was an observation of the great Peterborough, made within these walls, or within the walls where the Lords then assembled, that he was for a "parliamentary king and a parliamentary constitution, but not a parliamentary God, and a parliamentary religion. The interval of a century has not weakened the force of the remark. It is indeed true that we should leave these petty cavils on frivolous points, these sly epithets of sophistry whether our "eggs" are best broken at the broad or narrow end.

The opponents of the Catholics may be divided into two classes; those who assert that the Catholics have too much already, and those who allege that the lower orders, at least, have nothing more than they require. But it is to be noticed that Catholics will never be contented; by the latter, that they are already too happy. The last paradox is sufficiently refuted by the present, as by all past petitions; it might as well be said, that the negroes did not desire to be emancipated—but this is a fortunate comparison, for you have already delivered them out of the house of bondage without any petition on their part, but from their taskmasters to a contrary effect; and for myself, when I consider this, I pity the Catholic peasantry for not having the good fortune to be born black. But the Catholics are contented, or at least ought to be, as we are told: I shall therefore proceed to touch on a few of those circumstances in which so much has been attributed to their exceeding contentment. They are not allowed the free exercise of their religion in the regular army; the Catholic soldier cannot absent himself from his post without the leave of his captain; he is not a man, and, unless he is quartered in Ireland, or in Spain, where can he find eligible opportunities of attending his own? The permission of Catholic chaplains to the Irish militia regiments was conceded as a special favor, and not after years of reconnoissance, although an act, passed in 1738, established it as a right. But are the Catholics properly protected in Ireland? Can the church purchase a rood of land whereby to erect a chapel? No; all the places of worship are built on leases of trust or sufferance from the laity, easily broken and often betrayed. The moment any irregular wish, any casual caprice of the benevolent landlord meets with opposition, the doors are barred against the congregation. This has happened continually, but in no instance more glaringly, than at the town of Newtown Barrery in the county of Wexford. The Catholics, enjoying no regular chapel, as a temporary expedient, hired two barns, which, being thrown into one, served for public worship. At this time there was quartered opposite to the spot an officer, whose mind appears to have been deeply imbued with the spirit of slavish obedience. Thoroughly versed in regulations, now on the table, prove to have been fortuitously eradicated from the more rational portion of the people; and when the Catholics were assembled thereon, and theSuperintendent of the religious establishment was directed towards men, for the worship of their God and yours they found the chapel door closed, and were told that if they did not immediately retire, (and they were told this by a yeoman officer and a magistrate,) the riot act should be read, and the assembly dispersed at the point of the bayonet! This was complained of to the middle-man of government, the secretary at the Castle in 1806, and the answer was, in lieu of the quartering them, to write to the colonel, to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of similar disturbances. Upon this fact, no very great stress need be laid; but it tends to prove that the Catholic man does not desire to purchase land for its chapels to stand upon, the laws for its protection are of no avail. In the mean time, the Catholics are at the mercy of every "pelt- ing, petty officer," who may choose to play his "fanatic tricks" of "dechristianizing," to insult his God, and injure his fellow-creatures.

Every schoolboy, any footboy, (such have held commissions in our service,) any footboy who can exchange his "fanatic" for his "humble" is a "dechristianizer," to insult his God, and injure his fellow-subjects to the last drop of his blood, without discrimination or distinction between Catholic and Protestant.

Do the Irish Catholics the full benefit of trial by jury? They have not; they never can have until they are permitted to share the privilege of serving as jurors and under-sheriffs. Of this a striking example occurred at the last Enniskillen assizes. A yeoman, named Maevouragh: three respectable uncon- the prisoner load, take am, fire at, and kill the said Maevouragh. This was properly conveyed by the judge; but, to the astonishment of all, the court, the Protestant jury acquitted the accused. So glaring was the partiality, that Mr. Justice Osborne felt it his duty to bind over the acquitted, but not absolved, assassin, in large recognizances, thus for a time taking away his license to kill Catholics.

Are the very laws passed in favor of observed? They are rendered nugatory in trivial as in serious cases. By a late act, Catholics are permitted in jails, but in Fermanagh county the grand jury lately persisted in presenting a suspended clergymen for the office, thereby evading the statute, because they held the most pressing renunciation of a most respectable magistracy, named Fletcher, to the contrary. Such is law, such is justice, for the happy, free, contented Catholic!

In another place, why not the rich Catholics cast foundations for the education of the priesthood? Why do you not permit them to do so? Why are all such bequests subject to the interference, the vexatious, arbitrary, peculating interferences of the Orange commissioners for charitable donations?

As to Maynooth college, in no instance, except at the time of its foundation, when a noble Lord (Comden), at the head of the Irish administration, did appear to have regard for its advancement; and during the government of a noble Duke (Bedford), who, like his ancestors, has ever been the friend of freedom and mankind, and who has not so far adopted the selfish policy of the day as to exclude the Catholics from the number of his fellow-creatures; with these exceptions, in no instance has that institution been properly encouraged. There was indeed a time when the Catholic clergy were consecrated, while the Union was pending, the Union which could not be carried without them, while their assistance was requisite in procuring addresses from the Catholic counties; then they were dismissed, farmed, scattered, and given to understand that "the Union would do every thing;" but, the moment it was passed, they were driven back with contempt into their former occupations.

In the contemplus pursued towards Maynooth college, every thing is done to irritate and perplex—every thing is done to exclaim the slightest impression of gratitude from the Catholic mind; the very hay made upon the law, the fat and fow of the beef and mutton allowed, must be paid for and accounted upon oath. It is true, this economy in miniature cannot be sufficiently commended, perhaps the best way is to substitute the import duties of the treasury, your Hunts and your Chinneys, when only these "gilded bugs" can escape the microscopic eye of ministers. But when you come forward session after session, as your pauper pittance is always the last on the import duties, your chairmen are beloved of the bosom of your lissome, well might the Catholic

To John I owe some obligation, But John modestly thinks fit To write to me & all the nation No Job, and I am more than quit.

Some persons have compared the Catholics to the beggar in Gil Bias. Who made them beggars? Who are enriched with the spoils of their aces- for the murder of a Catholic named Maevouragh: three respectable uncon-
Among many causes of irritation, too numerous for recapitulation, there is one in the militia not to be passed over—I mean the existence of Orange lodges amongst the privates; can the officers deny this? And if such lodges do exist, do they, through the shades of their secrecy, prevent the mass of the people who are thus individually separated in society, although mingled in the ranks? And is this general system of persecution to be permitted, or is it to be believed that with such a system the Catholics can or ought to be contented? If they do so believe human nature; they are then, indeed, unworthy to be any thing but the slaves you have made them. The facts stated are from most respectable authority, or, if the Catholics are enthusiastic, or any thing to the place, to hazard this asovol. If exaggerated, there are plenty, as willing as I believe them to be, to disprove them. Should it be objected that I never was in Ireland, I beg leave to observe, that it is as easy to know something of Ireland without having been there, as it appears with some to have been born, bred, and cherished there, and yet remain ignorant of its best interests.

But there are, who assert that the Catholics have already been too much indulged: see (they what has been done: we have given them one entire college, we allow them food and raiment, the full enjoyment of sports, and holiday amusements, and liberty as long as they have limbs and lives to offer; and yet they are never to be satisfied! Generous and just declaimers! To this, and to this only, amount the whole of your arguments when strict of their sophistication. You have persuaded me of the story of a certain drummer, who being called upon in the course of duty to administer punishment to a friend tied to the halter's, was requested to flog 'high, high, down, down, the middle, he did—high, low, down the middle, and up again, but all in vain, the patient continued his complaints with the most provoking pertinacity, until the drummer, exhausted and angry, flung down his scourge, exclaiming, "the devil burn you, there's no pleasing you, flog where one will!" Thus it is, you have flogged the Catholic, high, low, here, there, and every where, and then you wonder he is not pleased. It is true, that time, experience, and that weariness which attends even the exercise of barbarity, have taught you to flog a little more gently, but still you continue to fay on the last, and will so continue, till perhaps the rod may be wrecked, and the hand fraud applied to the backs of yourselves and your posterity.

It was said by somebody in a former debate, (I forget by whom, and am not very anxious to remember, if the Catholics are enthusiastic, why not the Jews? If this sentiment was dictated by compunction for the Jews, it might deserve attention, but as a sneer against the Catholic, what is it but the language of Shylock transferred from his daughter's marriage to Catholic emancipation?

"Would any of the tribe of Benjamin Should here it rather be a Christian."

I presume a Catholic is a Christian, even in the apportion of him whose taste only can be called in question for his preference of the Jews. It is a remark often quoted of Dr. Johnson, (who had in his personal manners a great aptitude for the gentle apostle of intolerance, Dr. Duigenan,) that he who could entertain serious apprehensions of danger to the Church in these times, would have "early called himself a Jew." Alliteration, as a metaphor, for a remnant of these antediluvians appear actually to have come down to us, with fire in their mouths and water in their brains, to disturb and perplex mankind with their whimsical outcries. As there be subjects, which, not distrusting a sentiments with which I conceive them to be afflicted, (so any doctor will inform your lordships,) for the unhappy invalids to perceive a flame per-
If they are beloved here, in France they must be adored. There is no measure more repugnant to designs and feelings of Bonaparte than Catholic emancipation. But I fear that the most honest of his projects, than that which has been pursued, is pursuing, and, I fear, will be pursued towards Ireland. What is England without Ireland, and what Ireland without Great Britain? In its first operation, gave a death-blow to the independence of Ireland, and in its last may be the cause of her eternal separation from this country. If it must be carried, let it be done with the firm and solemn stroke with which his prey; the spoiler swallows up his victim, and thus they become one and indivisible. Thus has Great Britain swallowed up the parliament, the constitution, the independence of Ireland, and refused to disgrace even a single privilege, although for the relief of her swollen and distempered body politic.

And now, my lords, before I sit down, will his majesty’s ministers permit me to say a few words, not on their merits, for that would be superfluous, but on the degree of estimation in which they are held by the people of these realms. The esteem in which they are held has been restored in a triumphant manner upon several occasions. I have no doubt that there will be a comparison instituted between their conduct, and that of noble lords on this side of the house. What portion of popularity may have fallen to the share of those friends, if I may presume to call them, I shall not pretend to ascertain; but that of his majesty’s ministers it were vain to deny. It is, to be sure, a little like the workmen, who knows when it cometh or when it goeth, but they feel it, they enjoy it, they boast of it. Indeed, modest and unostentitious as they are, to what part of the kingdom, even the most remote, can they flee to avoid the triumph which crowns all their marks of approbation? If they take a trip from Portpatrick to Donaghadee, there will they rush at once into the embraces of four Catholic millions, to whom their vote of this night is about to open the rights of man which they have return to the metropolis, if they can pass under Temple Bar without unpleasant sensations at the sight of the greedy niches over that oamous gateway, which they cannot escape the acclamations of the lively, and the more treacherous, but not less sincere, applause, of those blessings “not loud but deep” of bankrupt merchants and doubting stockholders. If they look to the army, what wreaths, not of laurel, but of nightshade, are preparing for the heroes of Walcheren? It is true there are few living deponents left to testify to their merits on that occasion; but a “cloud of witnesses” are gone above from that gallant army which they so generously and piously despatched, to rendezvous the army of mains on Walcheren. What if, in the course of this triumphal career, (in which they will gather as many pebbles as Cæ- ligaba’s army did on a similar triumph, the prototype to which we are bound,) they may deride me, and say that they will not acknowledge the memorials which a grateful people erect in honor of their benefactors; what although not even a signpost will condescend to depose the Sarmec’s head in his own hands. This is the case of all the heroes of Wal- cheren, they will not want a picture who can always have a caricature; or regret the omission of a statue who will so often see themselves exalted in effigy. But their popularity is not limited to the narrow bounds of their own country. In other countries where their measures, and, above all, their conduct to the Catholics, must render them preeminently popular.

DEBATE ON MAJOR CARTWRIGHT’S PETITION
JUNE 1, 1813.

MY LORDS—The petition which I now hold for the purpose of presenting to the House, is one of those which I have presented to the metropolis, there they will be greeted by the manufacturers, with spurned petitions in their hands, and those halters round their necks recently voted in their behalf, implicating blessings on the heads of those who so simply, yet ingeniously contrived to remove them from their miseries in this to a better world. If they journey on to Scotland, from Glasgow to Johnny Groat’s, every where will they receive kindlier marks of approbation. If they take a trip from Portpatrick to Donaghadee, there will they rush at once into the embraces of four Catholic millions, to whom their vote of this night is about to open the rights of man which they have return to the metropolis, if they can pass under Temple Bar without unpleasant sensations at the sight of the greedy niches over that oamous gateway, which they cannot escape the acclamations of the lively, and the more treacherous, but not less sincere, applause, of those blessings “not loud but deep” of bankrupt merchants and doubting stockholders. If they look to the army, what wreaths, not of laurel, but of nightshade, are preparing for the heroes of Walcheren? It is true there are few living deponents left to testify to their merits on that occasion; but a “cloud of witnesses” are gone above from that gallant army which they so generously and piously despatched, to rendezvous the army of mains on Walcheren. What if, in the course of this triumphal career, (in which they will gather as many pebbles as Cæ- ligaba’s army did on a similar triumph, the prototype to which we are bound,) they may deride me, and say that they will not acknowledge the memorials which a grateful people erect in honor of their benefactors; what although not even a signpost will condescend to depose the Sarmec’s head in his own hands. This is the case of all the heroes of Wal- cheren, they will not want a picture who can always have a caricature; or regret the omission of a statue who will so often see themselves exalted in effigy. But their popularity is not limited to the narrow bounds of their own country. In other countries where their measures, and, above all, their conduct to the Catholics, must render them preeminently popular.

were seized by a military and civil force, and kept in close custody for several hours, subjected to gross and abusive insinuations from the commanding officer relative to the character of the petitioner; that he (the petitioner) was finally carried before a magiistrate; and not released till an examination of his papers proved that there was not only no just, but not even a justifiable charge against him; and that, notwithstanding the promise and order from the presiding magistrates of a copy of the warrant against the petitioner, it was afterwards withheld on divers pretexts, and has never until this hour been granted. The names and condition of the parties will be found in the petition. To the other part of it, touched upon in the petition, I shall not now advert, from a wish not to encroach upon the time of the House; but I do most sincerely call the attention of your lordships to its general contents—it is in the cause of the parliament and people that the rights of this venerable freeman have been violated, and it is, in my opinion, the highest mark of respect that could be paid to the House, that to your justice, rather than by appeal to any inferior court, he now commits himself. Whatever may be the fate of his remonstrance, it is some satisfaction to me, though mixed with regret for the occasion, that I have this opportunity of publicly stating the obstruction to which the subject is liable, in the prosecution of the most lawful and imperious of his duties the obtaining by petition reform in parlia-mence. I have shortly stated his complaint; the petitioner has more fully expressed it. Your lordships will, I hope, adopt some measure fully to protect and redress him, and not him alone, but the whole body of the people insulted and aggrieved in his person by the interposition of an abused civil, and unlawful military force, between them and their right of petition to their own representatives.

His lordship then presented the petition from Major Cartwright, which was read, complaining of the circumstances at Huddersfield and of interpotions given to the right of petitioning, in several places in the northern parts of the kingdom, and which his lordship moved should be laid on the table.

Several Lords having spoken on the question, LORD BYRON replied, that he had, from no lives of duty, presented this petition to their lordships' consideration. The noble Earl had contended that it was not a petition but a speech; and that, as it contained no prayer, it should not be received. What was the necessity of a prayer? If that word were to be used in its proper sense, their lordships could not expect that any man should pray to others. He had only to say that the petition, though in some parts expressed strongly perhaps, did not contain any improper mode of address, but was couched in respectful language towards their lordships; he should therefore trust their lordships would allow the petition to be received.

A FRAGMENT.

June 17, 1819.

In the year 17—, having for some time determined on a journey through countries hitherto so much frequented by travellers, I set out, accompanied by a friend whom I shall designate by the name of Augustus Darvell. He was a few years my elder, and a man of considerable fortune and ancient family—advantages which an extensive capacity prevented him alike from undervaluing or over-rating. Some peculiar circumstances in his private history had rendered him to me an object of attention of interest, and even of regard, which neither the reserve of his manners, nor occasional indications of an inquietude at times nearly approaching to alienation of mind, could extinguish.

He was yet young in life, which I had begun early; but my intimacy with him was of a recent date; we had been educated at the same schools and university; but his progress through these had preceded mine, and he had been deeply initiated into what is called the world, while I was yet in my noviciate. While thus engaged, I had heard much both of his past and present life; and, although in these accounts there were many and irreconcilable contradictions, I could still gather from the whole that he was a being of no common order, and one who, whatever pains he might take to avoid remark, would still be remarkable. I had cultivated his acquaintance sincerely, and endeavored to obtain his friendship, but this last appeared to be unattainable; whatever affections he might have possessed seemed now, some to have been extinguished and others to be concentrated: that his feelings were acute, I had sufficient opportunities of observing; for, although he could control, he could not altogether disguise them: still he had a d power of giving to one passion the appearance of another in such a manner that it was difficult to define the nature of what was working within him; and the expression of his features would vary so rapidly, though slightly, that it was useless to trace them to their sources. It was evident that he was a prey to some cruel sense of disease; but whether it rose from ambition, love, remorse, grief, from one or all of these, or merely from a morbid tempera-tment akin to disease, I could not discover: there were circumstances alleged which might have justified the application to each of these causes; but, as I have before said, these were so contradictory and contradicted, that none could be fixed upon with accuracy. Where there is mystery, it is generally supposed that there must also be evil: I know not how this may be, but in him there certainly was the one, though I could not ascertain the extent of the other—and felt loth, as far as regarded himself, to believe in its existence. My advances were received with sufficient coldness; but I was young, and not easily discouraged, and at length succeeded in obtaining, to a certain degree, that common-place intercourse and moderate confidence of common and every-day concerns created and cemented by similarity of pursuit and frequency of meeting; which he called intimacy, or friendship according to the ideas of him who uses those words to express them.

Darvell had already travelled extensively, and to him I had applied for information with regard to
"You have been here before!—If w came you never to mention this to me and what could you be doing in a place where no one would remain a moment longer than they could help it?"

To this question I received no answer. In the mean time I felt mean this had a fex to be in-coming to I was leaving the sergues and the horses at the fountain. The quekening of his thirst had the appearance of reviving him for a moment; and I conceived hopes of his being able to proceed, or at least to return, and I uncorked the bottle:—and appeared to be collecting his spirits for an effort to speak. He began—

"This is the end of my journey, and of my life—

I came here to die; but I have a request to make—"

"It cannot be helped, you must swear.

I took the oath; it appeared to relieve him. He removed a seal-ring from his finger, on which were some Arable characters, and presented it to me.

"The ninth day of the month, at noon precisely, (what month you please, but this must be the day,) you must bring this ring into the salt springs which run into the basin of Eleusis: the day after, at the same hour, you must repair to the ruins of the temple of Ceres, and wait one hour—"

"Why?"

"You will see."

"The ninth day of the month, you say?"

"The ninth."

As I observed that the present was the ninth day of the month, his countenance changed, and he ceased. As he spoke, evidently becoming more feeble, a stork, with a snake in her beak, perched upon a tombstone near us; and, without devouing her prey, appeared to be steadfastly regarding us. I know not what impelled me to drive it away; but, by the attention with which it was attended, I felt convinced that the sergeress had ever been a sojourner in this wilderness. The only caravansers we had seen was left some hours behind us; not a vestige of a town or encampment within sight. The air was calm, and lighted up the "city of the dead" to appear the sole refuge for my unfortunate friend, who seemed on the verge of becoming the last of its inhabitants."

In this situation, I looked round for a place where he might most conveniently repose:—contrary to the usual aspect of Mahometan burial grounds, the cypress-ports were in this few number, and these thinly scattered over its extent; the tombstones mostly fallen, and worn with age; upon one of the most considerable of these, and beneath one of the most spreading trees, Darrell supported himself, in a half-reclining posture, with great difficulty; he asked for water. I had some doubts of our being able to find any, and prepared to go in search of it, with hesitating despondency—but he desired me to remain: and, turning to Sulceman, one of the band, whispering by the ear, "Sulceman, tranquillize," (I. e. bear some water,) and went on describing the spot where it was to be found with great minuteness, at a small well for camels, a few hundred yards to the right of the burying-ground. I asked him of the cypress-ports; he said to Darrell,

"How did you know this?"—He replied, "From our situation: you must perceive that this place was once inhabited, and could not have been so without springs; I have also been here before."

rapidly altering, and nothing remained but to fulfil his request. With the aid of Suleiman's ataghans and my own sabor, we scooped a shallow grave upon the spot which Darrell had indicated; the earth each was way, having already received some Mahometan tenant. We dug as deeply as the time permitted us, and throwing the dry earth upon all that remained of the singular being so lately departed, we cut a few sods of greener turf from the less withered soil around us, and laid them upon his sepulchre.

Between astonishment and grief, I was tearless.

LETTER TO JOHN MURRAY

ON THE REV. W. L. BOWLES'S STRICTURES ON THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF POPE.

"I'll play at Bowles with the sun and moon.," OLD SONG.

"My mother's word, sir, and she has rather forgotten herself in speaking to my Lecky, that cannot well be to contradicted, (as I ken nobody likes it if they could help themseh.)"
TALES OF MY LANDLORD, Old Marronie, vol. 8.

DEAR SIR,

In the different pamphlets which you have had the goodness to send me, on the Pope and Bowles' controversy, I perceive that my name is occasionally introduced by both parties. Mr. Bowles refers more than once to what he is pleased to consider "a remarkable circumstance," not only in his letter to Mr. Campbell, but in his reply to the Quarterly.
The Quarterly also and Mr. Gilchrist have conferred on me the dangerous honor of a quotation; and Mr. Bowles indirectly makes a kind of appeal to me personally, by saying, "Lord Byron, if he remembers the circumstance, will witness—witness in ITALIC, an ominous character for a testimony at present."

I shall not avail myself of a "non mi ricordo" even after so long a residence in Italy;—I do "remember the circumstance"—and have no reluctance to relate it (since called upon so to do) as correctly as the distance of time and the impression of intervening events will permit me. In the year 1812, more than three years after the publication of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." I had the honor of meeting Mr. Bowles in the house of our venerable host of "Human Life, etc.," the last Argonaut of classic English poetry, and the Nestor of our inferior race of living poets. Mr. Bowles calls this "soon after" the publication; but to me three years appear a considerable segment of the immortality of a modern poet. I recollect nothing of the rest of the company going into another room—nor, though I well remember the topography of our host's elegant and classically-furnished mansion, could I swear to the very room where the conversation occurred, though the "taking down the poem" seems to fix it in the library.
Had it been "taken up," it would probably have been in the drawing-room. I presume also that the "remarkable circumstance" took place after dinner, as I conceive that neither Mr. Bowles's politeness nor appetite would have allowed him to detain
"the rest of the company" standing round their chairs in the "other room," while we were disenssing "the Woods of Madeira" instead of circulating its vintage. Of Mr. Bowles's "good-humor" I have a full and not ungrateful recollection; as also of his gentlemanly manners and agreeable conversation. I speak of the whole, and not of particulars; for whether he did or did not use the precise words printed in the pamphlet, I cannot say, nor could he be with accuracy. Of "the tone of seriousness" I certainly recollect nothing: on the contrary, I thought Mr. Bowles rather disposed to treat the subject lightly; for he said (I have no objection to be contradicted if incorrect) that some of his good-natured friends had come to him and exclaimed, "Eh! Bowles! how came you to make the Woods of Madeira," etc., etc., and that he had been at some pains and pulling down of the poem to convince them that he had never made "the Woods" do any thing of the kind. He was right, and I was wrong, and have been wrong still up to this acknowledgment; for I ought to have looked twice before I wrote that which involved an inaccuracy capable of giving pain. The fact was, that although I had certainly before read "the Spirit of Discovery," I took the quotation from the review.
But the mistake was mine, and not the review's, which quoted the passage correctly enough, I believe. I blundered—God knows how—into at-tributing the tremors of the lovers to the "Woods of Madeira," by which they were surrounded. And I hereby do fully and freely declare and asseverate, that the Woods did not tremble to a kiss, and that the lovers did. I quote from memory—

"A kiss

Said on a "Catching silence, etc., etc.,
They (the lovers) trembled, even as if the power, sir.

And if I had been aware that this declaration would have been in the smallest degree satisfactory to Mr.
Bowles, I should not have waited nine years to make it, notwithstanding that "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" had been suppressed some time.

previously to my meeting him at Mr. Rogers's. Our worthy host might indeed have told him as much as I have, and I am sure he would have pressed it. A new edition of that lampoon was preparing for the press, when Mr. Rogers represented to me, that "I was more acquainted with many of the persons mentioned in it, and with some on terms of intimacy, and that I knew 'the family in particular to whom its suppression would give pleasure.' I did not hesitate one moment; it was cancelled instantly; and it is no fault of mine that it has not appeared in English. When our friends were all in Ireland, in April, 1816, with no very violent intentions of troubling that country again, and amidst scenes of various kinds to distract my attention—almost my last act, I believe, was to sign a power of attorney, to yourself, to prevent or suppress any attempts (of which several had been made in Ireland) at a republication. It is proper that I should state, that the persons with whom I was subsequently acquainted, whose names had occurred in that publication, were made my acquaintances at their own desire, or through the unsought intervention of others. I never, to the best of my knowledge, incurred solicitude of any kind to them; and of all those to this day I know only by correspondence; and with one of those it was begun by myself, in consequence, however, of a polite verbal communication from a third person.

I have an instant on these circumstances because it has sometimes been made a subject of bitter reproach to me to have endeavored to suppress that satire. I never shrunk, as those who know me know from any personal consequences which could be attached to its publication. Of its subsequent suppression, as I possessed the copyright, I was the best judge and the sole judge. The circumstances which occasioned the suppression I thought it my duty to explain; if my duty, each must judge according to his candor or malignity. Mr. Bowles does me the honor to talk of 'noble mind,' and of 'generous magnanimity;' and all this because "the circumstance would have been explained had the book been suppressed." I see no "nobilility of mind" in an act of simple justice; and I hate the word "magnanimity," because I have sometimes seen it applied to the grossest of impostors by the greatest of fools; but I would have explained the circumstance, notwithstanding "the suppression of the book," if Mr. Bowles had expressed any desire thit I should. As the "gallant Gallus" says, "Mr. Galba will take the mistake and all that occasioned it." I have had as great and greater mistakes made about me personally and poetically, once a month for these last ten years, and much about correcting one or the other, at least after the first eight or forty hours had gone over them. I must now, however, say a word or two about Pope, of whom you have my opinion more at large in the unprinted letter on or to (for I forgot which) the editor of "Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine;"—and here I doubt that Mr. Bowles will not approve of my sentiments.

Although having published "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," the part which I regret the least is that which regards Mr. Bowles with respect to Pope. Whilst I was writing that publication, in 1807 and 1808, Mr. Hobhouse was destroyed; this was the occasion of my editorial attack upon Pope, and of Mr. Bowles's edition of his works. At I had completed my outline, and felt lazy, I requested that he would do so. He did it. His fourteen years' residence in Paris, the new Bardi and Scotch Reviewers;" and we are quite as severe and much more poetical than my own in the second. On reprinting the work, as I have no pleasure in doing it, I should have recommended a few cuts and replaced them with my own, by which the work gained less than Mr. Bowles. I have stated this in the preface to the second edition. It is many years since I have read that poem; but the Quarterly Review, Mr. Octavius Gibichrist, and Mr. Bowles himself, request me to reprint it. I know he does not deserve this character. I know no such thing. I have met Mr. Bowles occasionally, in the best society in London; he appeared to me an honest man, and a gentleman. He is desirous of no such man. I desire nothing better than to dine in company with such a mannered man every day in the week; but of "his character" I know nothing personally; I really speak of his manners, and these have my warmest approbation. But I never judge from manners, for I once had my pocket picked by the civilist gentleman I ever met with; and one of the mildest persons I ever saw was all Pacha. Of Mr. Bowles's "character" I will not do him the injustice to judge from the edition of Pope, if he prepared it heedlessly; nor the justice, should he be otherwise, because I would neither become a literary executioner, nor would I publish Bowles the individual, and Mr. Bowles the editor, appear the two most opposite things imaginable.

"And he himself once —— author." I won't say "vile," because it is harsh; nor "mistaken," because it has two syllables; but every one must fill up the blank as he pleases.

What I saw of Mr. Bowles increased my surprise and regret that he should ever have lent his talents to such a task. If he had been a fool, there would have been some excuse for him; as he was a needy or a bad man, his conduct would have been intelligible; but he is the opposite of all these; and thinking and feeling as I do of Pope, to me the whole thing is incomprehensible. For it may not be, that such passages exist; and that Pope, who was not a monk, although a Catholic, may have occasionally slipped in word and deed with woman in his youth; but is this a sufficient ground for such a sweeping denunciation? Where is the unmarmorized Englishman of a certain rank of life, who (provided he has not taken orders) has not to reproach himself between the ages of sixteen and thirty with far more licentiousness than has ever yet been trace to Pope? Pope lived in the public eye from his youth upwards; he had all the dunces of his own time for his enemies, and, I am sorry to say, some who have not the sympathy of delusion for detection since his death; and yet to what do all their accumulated hints and charges amount; —to an equivocal aversion with Martha Blount, which might arise as much from his infirmities as from his passions; to a hopeless flirtation with Mary W. Montagu; to a story of Cibber's; and to two or three coarse passages in his works. Who could come forth clearer from an invincible inquest on a life of itself? I am not pleased with Lord Byron's letters of other occasions, nay, predominant, deprecating poet, so abominably gross, and elaborately coarse, that I do not believe that they could be paralleled in our language. What is more strange, is, that some of these are couched as postscripts to his serious and sentimential letters, to which he is tackeld either a piece of prose, or some verses, of the most hypocritical kind. Mr. Addison says that "obscenity (using a much coarser word) be the sin against the Holy Ghost, he most certainly cannot be saved." These letters are in existence, and have been accused of the same vice; but would his editor have been "candid" in even alluding to them? Nothing would have even provoked me, an indissipant spectator, to allude to them, but this further attempt at the deprecation of Pope.

Yes; to be "candid" like a Mr. Addison, who cited the following passage from Walpole's letters to George Montagu: "Dr. Young has published a new book, etc. Mr. Addison sent for the young Earl of Warwick, as he was dying, to show him in what sense a Christian could die; peradventure, he died of broody: nothing makes a Christian die in peace like being mauled but don't say this in Gath, where you are." Suppose the editor introduced it with this preface: "Mr. Addison entertained the notion mentioned by Horace Walpole, which, if true, was assuredly flagitious. Walpole informs Montagu that Addison sent for the young Earl of Warwick, when dying, to show him in what sense a Christian could die; but unluckily he died drunk, etc., etc.

Now, as though there might occur on the subsequent, or on the same page, a faint show of disbelieve, seasoned with the expression of "the some candor," (the very exact phrase as 1a made) we would say that this editor was either foolish or false to his trust: such a story ought not to be have admitted, except for one brief mark of crushing indignation; unless it were a complete process. Why the words "true"? That "that" is not a poet-makor. Why talk of "Gibber's testimony" to his candor? To what does this amount? That Pope, when very young, was once decayed by some misadventure and brought to a hospital; by this accidental reception Mr. Bowles was not always a clergyman; and when he was a very young man, was he never rescued into as much? If I were in the humor for story-telling, and relating little anecdotes, I could tell a much better story of Mr. Bowles than Cibber's, upon much better authority, viz., that of Mr. Bowles himself. It was not related by him in my presence, but in that of a third person, whom Mr. Bowles would not have believe or even by the course of his replies. This gentleman related it to me as a humorous and witty anecdote; and so it was, whatever its other characteristics might be. But should I be unwilling to have "the libertine sort of love," or with "licentiousness?" is he the less now a pious or a good man for not having always been a priest? No such thing; I am willing to believe him a good man, almost as good a man as Pope, but no better.

The truth is, that in these days the grand "primus mobili" of England is cant; cant political, cant poetical, cant religious, cant moral; but always cant; and the consequence is not that the English are the fashion, and while it lasts will be too powerful for t.23 who can only exist by taking the tone of the time. I say cant, because it is a thing of words, without the smallest influence upon human actions; the English being no wiser, no better, and much poorer, and more divided among themselves, as well as far less moral, than they were before the prevalence of this verbal decorum. This hysterial household fashion, once maintained, and never fully proved amours, (even for Cibber owns that he prevented the somewhat perilous adventure in which Pope was embarking,) sounds very virtuous in a controversial pamphlet; but all men of the world doubtless agree that it was not to their youth, must laugh at such a ludicrous foundation of the charge of a "libertine sort of love;" while the more serious will look upon those who bring forward such charges upon an insulated fact, as fanatics or hypocrites, perhaps both. The two are sometimes compounded in a happy mixture.

Mr. Octavius Glideli speaks rather irreverently of a "second tumbler of hot white-wine negus." What does he mean? Is there any harm in negus? or is it the worse for being hot? or does Mr. Bowles drink negus? I had a better opinion of him. I hope that he never drank negus; or at least that, like the ordinary in Jonathan Wild, "he preferred punch, the rather as there was nothing against it in Scripture." I should be sorry to believe that Mr. Bowles was fond of negus; it is such a thing as a "candid" man would not aline between the passion for wine and the propriety of water. But different writers have divers tastes.

Judge Blackstone composed his "Commentaries," (he was a poet too, in his youth,) with a bottle of port before him. Addison's conversation was not good for much till he had taken a similar dose. Perhaps the prescription of these two great men was not ir part to the very different one of a soi-disant poet of this day, who, after wandering among the hills, returns, goes to bed, and dictates his verses, being fed by a bystander with bread and butter, during the operation.

I now come to Mr. Bowles's "invariable principles of poetry." These Mr. Bowles and some of his correspondents pronounce "unanswerable;" and they are "unanswerable," at least by Campbell, who seems to have been astounded by the title. The sultan in his rage, is said to have spoken to the king of France, because he "hated the word league:" which proves that the Padishan understood French. Mr. Campbell has no need of my allusions, nor is there occasion to press it; but I do hate that word "invariable." What is there of human, be it poetry, philosophy, wit, wisdom, science, power, glory, mind, matter, life or death which is "invariable?" Of course I put things divine out of the question. Of all arrogance, but none of the terms of a book, this title to a pamphlet appears the most complacently conceited. It is Mr. Campbell's part to assert the contents of this performance, and especially to vindicate his own "Ship," which Mr. Bowles most triumphantly proclaims to have struck to his very first fire.

"Quodh by seen was a Ship. Now let me see, there gra-hold'd no, Or my staff shall make this ship!"

It is no affair of mine, but having once been, in (ceceerably not a friend to Mr. Bowles with but a small degree of the frequent recurrence to my name in the pamphlet, I am like an Irishman in a "row," "any body's customer.") I shall therefore say a word or two on the "Ship.") Mr. Bowles asserts that Campbell's "Ship of the Line" derives all its poetry not from "art" but from "nature." "Take away the waves, the winds the sun, etc., etc., one will become a stripe of blue-lining; and the other a picture of course can on three tall poles. Very true; take away "the waves," "the winds," and there will be no ship at all, not only for poetical, but for any other purposes; and take away "the sun," and we must read Mr. Bowles's pamphlet by candlelight. But the "poetry" of the "Ship" does not depend on "the waves," etc.; on the contrary, the "Ship of the Line" confers its own poetry upon the waters, and heightens their beauty. It is not true, that the "waves and winds," and above all the "sun," are highly poetical; we know it to our cost, by the many descriptions of them in verse: but if the waves bore only the foam upon their bosoms, if the winds wafted only the smoke to the infernal regions, if the sun shone neither upon pyramids, nor fleets nor fortresses, would its beams be equally poetical? I think not: the poetry is at least reciprocal. Take away "the ship of the line," "swinging round"
the "calm water," and the calm water becomes a somewhat monotonous thing to look at, particularly if not transparently clear; witness the thousands who pass by without looking on it at all. What was it attracted the thing? Was it the coasts, and in the launch? They might have seen the poetical "calm water," at Wapping, or in the "London Dock," or in the Paddington Canal, or in a horsepond, or in a slop-basin, or in any other vaze. They might have heard the poetical winds, the chinks of a pig-sty, or the garret-window; they might have seen the sun shining on a footman's livery, or on a brass warming-pan; but could the "calm water," or the "sun," make all, or any of these, "poetical?" I think not. Mr. Bowles admits the "ship" to be poetical, but only from those accessories: now if they convey poetry so as to make one thing poetical, they would make other things poetical; the more so, as Mr. Bowles calls a "ship of the line" without them, that is to say, its "masts and sails and streamers," "bluebunting," and "coarse canvas," and "tall poles." So they are a ship and a sail and a ship and a sail, and flesh is grass, and yet the latter at least are the subjects of much poesy.

Did Mr. Bowles ever gaze upon the sea? I presume that he has, at least upon a sea-piece. Did a voyage take place in the "Forerunner," without the addition of a boat, ship, or some such adjunct? Is the sea itself a more attractive, a more moral, a poetical object with or without a vessel, enclasp to poetical faith? Is a storm more poetical without a ship? or, in the poem of the Shakespeare, is it the storm or the ship which interests? both much, undoubtedly; but without the vessel, what should we care for the tempest? It would not be the "poetical" object, the descriptive poem, which, in itself, was never esteemed a high order of that art.

I look upon myself as entitled to talk of naval masters, at least of poetic—with the exception of Walter Scott, Moore, and Southey, perhaps, (who have been voyagers,) I have seen more miles than all the rest of them together now living ever sailed, and have lived for months and months on board, and during the whole period of my life abroad, have scarce ever passed a month out of sight of the ocean, besides being brought up from two years till ten on the brink of it. I collect, when anchored off Cape St. Vincent, in an English frigate, a violent squall coming on at sunset, so violent as to make us imagine that the ship would part cable, or drive from her anchorage. Mr. Hobhouse and myself, and some officers, had been up the Dardanelles, and had been out on it; and the "Hobhouse" was exposed in time.

The aspect of a storm in the Archipelago is poetic, as need be, the sea being particularly short, dashing, and dangerous, and the navigation intricate and broken by the islands and currents. Cape Sigeum, the tunnul of the Troad, Lemnos, Tenedos, all added to the associations of the time. But what seemed the most "poetical" of all at the moment, as we were in a humble boat (and not a hundred) of Greek and Turkish craft, which were obliged to "cut and run" before the wind, from their unsafe anchorage, some for Tenedos, some for other isles, some for the main, and some it might be for eternity, as attending with more "descriptive" poetry, as the sea is like all other seas; the "marble" of Palmyra makes the poetry of the passage as of the place.

The beautiful but barren Hymettus, the whole coast of Attica, her hills and mountains, Parnassus, Asclepeion, Parnassus, Phileopolis, etc., are, in themselves poetical, and would be so if the name of Athens, of Athenians, and even very ruins, were swept from the earth. But am I to be told that the "nature" of Attica would be more poetical without the "art" of the Acropolis or of the Temple of Theseus? and of the still all Greek and glorious monuments of her exquisitly artifical genius? Ask the traveller who sees the "Forerunner" as the most poetical, as Parthenon, or the rock on which it stands? The columns of Cape Column, or the Cape itself? The rocks, at the foot of it, or the recollection that Pausanias's ship was becalmed and jolted upon them? The thousand rocks and capes, far more picturesque than those of the Acropolis and Cape Sunium in themselves; what are they to a thousand scenes in the wilder parts of Greece, of Asia Minor, Switzerland, or even of Corsica in Portugal, or to many scenes of Italy, and the Sierras of Spain? But it is the "art," the columns, the temples, the wrecked vessel, which give them their antique and their modern poetical and esthetic power. Without them, the spots of earth would be unnoticed and unknown; buried, like Babylon and Nineveh, in indiscriminate confusion, without poetry, as without existence; but to whose spirit of earth these ruins would be like all the rest: were they capable of transportation, like the obelisk, and the sphinx, and the Memnon's head, they would still exist in the perfection of their beauty, and in the pride of their prudence of their power. I remember the rol yvon ruins from Athens, to instruct the English in sculpture; but why did I no? The ruins are as poetical in Piccadilly as they were in the Parthenon... but the art of Parthenon and the ruins are less so without the Art. Such is the poetry of art.

Mr. Bowles contends, again, that the pyramids of Egypt are poetical, because of "the association with boundless deserts," and that a "pyramid of the same dimensions" would not be sublime in Lucian's Inn Fields;" not so poetical, certainly; but take away the "pyramids," and what is the "desert?" Take away Stone henge from Salisbury Plain: and it is nothing more so, as they are direct manifestations of mina, and presuppose poetry in their very conception; and have, moreover, as being such, a something of actual life, which cannot belong to any part of immanate nature, unless we adopt the system of Spinoza, that the world is the Deity. There can be no more poetical in its aspect than the city of Venice: does this depend upon the sea, or the canals?—

"The dirt and seaweed whence proud Venice rose!"

Is it the canal which runs between the palace and the prison, or the "Bridge of Sighs" which connects them, that render it poetical? Is it the Canal Grande, and the gondolas which glide over the waters, that render this city more poetical than Rome itself? Mr. Bowles says, "This is marble, the palaces and churches only stone, and the gondolas a "coarse" black cloth, thrown over some planks of carved wood, with a shining bit of fantastically-ironed horn at the prow, "without" the water. And I tell him that without these the water would be nothing but a clay-colored ditch, and whoever says the contrary, deserves to be at the bottom of that where Pope's heroes are embraced by the mountain of Calvaries. Nothing but a gondola can make the canal of Venice more poetical than that of Paddington, were it not for the artificial adjuncts above mentioned, although it is a perfectly natural canal, formed by the sea, and the innumerable islands which constitute the site of this extraordinary city.

The very Cloacae of Tarquin at Rome are as poetical as Richmond Hill; many will think more so. To the most poetical of all the modern poets, the sound of the sea in the nature of Evander's time; let Mr. Bowles, or Mr. Wordsworth, or Mr. Southey, or any of the other "naturals," make a poem upon them, and then see which is most poetical, their production or his. Mr. Bowles gives us a great guide-book in his "voyage," and tells us the road from St. Peter's to the Coliseum, and informs you what you will see by the way. The ground-interests in Virgil, because it will be Rome, and not because it is Evander's rural domain.

Mr. Bowles then proceeds to press Homer into his service, in answer to a remark of Mr. Campbell's, that "Homer was a great describer of works of art." Mr. B. replies, that all his great power, even in this, depends upon his connexion with nature. The "shield of Achilles" derives its poetical interest from the subjects described on it. And from what does the spear of Achilles derive its interest? and the hellet and the nothing more than his person, and the celestial armor, and the very brazen greaves of the well-botted Greeks? Is it solely from the legs, and the back, and the breast, and the human body, and the weapons? In that case, I would have been more poetical to have made Achilles fight naked, and Gilly and Gregson, as being nearer to a state of nature, are more poetical, boxing in a pair of drawers, than Hector and Achilles in radiant armor, and with heroic weapons.

Instead of the clash of helmets, and the rushing of chariots, and the whizzing of spears, and the glancing of swords, and the elevating of shields, and the piercing of breastplates, why not represent the Greeks and Trojans like two savage tribes, tugging at and tearing, and kicking, and biting, and gnashing, foaming, grinning, and gouging, in all the poetry of martial nature, unenumbered with gross, profane, artificial armor, and the embodiment of the natural warrior, and his natural poet? Is there any thing unpoetical in Ulysses striking the horses of Rhesus with his bow, (having forgotten his thongs,) or would Mr. Bowles have him kick them with his foot, or smack them with his hand, as being more unpoetical?

In Gray's Elegy, is there an image more striking than his "shapeless sculpture?" Of sculpture in general, it is true, it is more poetical than nature itself, inasmuch as it represents and bodies forth that ideal beauty and sublimity which is never to be found in actual nature. This at least is the general opinion; but, always excepting the Venus di Medici, I differ from that opinion; at least as far as regards female beauty, for the head of Lady Charlemont (when I first saw her, nine years ago) seemed to possess all that sculpture could require for its ideal. I recollect seeing something of the same kind in the head of an Albanian girl, who was actually employed in mending a road in the mountains, and in some Greek, and one or two Italian statues of young girls. But ask Mr. Bowles if anything in human nature at all to approach the expression of sculpture, either in the Apollo, the Moses, or other of the stern works of ancient or modern art.

Let us examine a little further this "bubble of green fields," and of bare nature in general, as superior to artificial imagery, for the poetical purposes of the fine arts. In landscape painting, the great artist does not give you a literal copy of a country, but he invents and composes one. Nature, in its actual aspect, does not furnish him with such existing scenes as he requires. Even where he presents you with some famous city, or celebrated scene from Mount Athos or from Nepal, he can take from some particular point of view, and with such light, and shade, and distance, etc., as serve not only to heighten its beauties, but to shadow its deformities. The poetry of nature alone, exactly as she appears, is not sufficient to bear him out. The very sky of his painting is not the portrait of the sky of nature; it is a composition of different skies, observed at different times, and not the whole copied from any particular day. And the poet has the same liberty which is not the portrait of the sky of nature; it is a composition of different skies, observed at different times, and not the whole copied from any particular day. And the poet has the same liberty which

When Canova forms a statue, he takes a limb from one, a hand from another, a feature from a third, and a shape, it may be, from a fourth, probably at the same time improving upon all, as the Greek of old did in embodying his Venus.

Ask a portrait painter to describe his sitters in accommodating the faces with which Nature and his sitters have crowded his painting-room to the principles of his art; with the exception of perhaps ten faces in as many millions, there is not one which he can venture to give without shading much and adding more. Nature, exactly simple, bears the painter nothing, it will make no great artist of any kind, and least of all a poet—the most artificial, perhaps, of all artists in his very essence. With regard to natural imagery, the man so equal and true to Nature are the best illustrations from art. You say that "a fountain is as clear or cleaner than glass," to express its beauty—

"A font Danubiana, splendoris virum!"

In the speech of Mark Antony, the body of Caesar is displayed, but so also is his mantle—

"You all saw me this morning," etc.

"Look! in this place ran Cassius' dagger through.
BYRON’S WORKS.

To return once more to the sea. Let any one look on the long wall of Malamocco, which marks the Adriatic, and pronounce between the sea and its master. Surely that Roman work, (I mean Roman in conception and performance,) which says to me as to others, ‘What chance have I with the waves?’ and still more, ‘What chance have I beyond the waves?’ is not less sublime and poetical than the angry waves which vaingloriously break beneath it.

Mr. Bowles makes the chief part of such poetry depend on the ‘wind’; then why is a ship under sail more poetical than a hog in a high wind? The hog is all nature, the ship is all art, ‘coarse canvas,’ ‘blue bunting,’ and ‘all holes’: both are violently acted upon by the wind, tossed here and there, and to and fro; and yet nothing but excessive hunger could make me look upon the pig as the more poetical of the two, and then only in the shape of a griskin.

Will Mr. Bowles tell us that the poetry of an aqueduct consists in the water which it conveys? Let him look on that of Justinian, on those of Rome, Constantinople, Lisbon, and Elvas, or even at the highest order of dramatics, as far as success goes, or Young, or even Otway and Southerne.

We are asked what makes the venerable towers of Westminster Abbey more poetical, as objects, than the tower for the manufacture of patent shot, surrounded by the same scenery? I will answer with the art of Turn Westminister, or Saint Paul’s, into a powder magazine, their poetry, as objects, remains the same; the Parthenon was actually converted into one by the Turks, during the Horatian’s Vesper sings, and part of the tower, in consequence. Cromwell’s dragoons staid their steeds in Worcester Cathedral; was it less poetical, as an object, than before? Ask a foreigner on his approach to London, what strikes him as the most poetical spot in the country, and he will run out, St. Paul’s and Westminster Abbey, without, perhaps, knowing the names or associations of either, and pass over the ‘tower for patent shot’, not that, for any thing he knows to the contrary, it might not be the mausoleum of a monarch, or a Waterloo column, or a Trafalgar monument, but because its architecture is obviously inferior.

To the question, ‘whether the description of a game of cards be as poetical, supposing the execution of the artists equal, as a description of a walk in a forest?” it may be answered, that the materials are certainly not equal; but that the artist, who has the more superior imagination is by far the greater of the two. But all this “ordering” of poets is purely arbitrary on the part of Mr. Bowles. There may or may not be, in fact, different degrees of poeticality, but the poet is always ranked according to his execution, and not according to his branch of the art.

Tragedy is one of the highest presumed orders. Hughes has written a tragedy, and a very successful one; Fenton another; and Pope none. Did any man, however,—will even Mr. Bowles himself rank Hughes and Fenton as poets above Pope? Was even Addison, (the author of Cato,) or Rowe (one of the highest order of dramatics, as far as success goes), or Young, or even Otway and Southerne, ever praised for a moment to the same rank with Pope in the estimation of the reader or the critic, before his death or after? If Mr. Bowles will contend for classifications of this kind, let him recollect that descriptive poetry has been ranked as among the lowest branches of the art, and description as a mere ornament, but which should never form the subject of the poem. The Italian, the French, the most poetical language, and the most fastidious taste in Europe, possess now five great poets, they say, Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, Tasso, and lastly Alberi; and whom of them do they esteem one of the highest of these, and some of them the very highest? Petrarch, the sonneteer: it is true that some of his Canzoni are not less esteemed, but not more; whatever dreams of his Latin Africa?

If the poet had said that Caesar had run his ship through the rent of the mantle, it would have had more of Mr. Bowles’s ‘nature’ to help it; but the artificial dagger is more poetical than any natural hand without it. In the sublime of sacred poetry, “Who is that man of Israel that cometh from Egypt?” with dyed garments from Bozrah? Would the ‘comer’ be poetical without his “dyed garments?” which strike and startle the spectator, and identify the approaching object.

The mother of Sisera is represented listening for the “wheels of his chariot.” Solomon, in his Song, compares the nose of his beloved to a “tower,” which to us appears an Eastern exaggeration. If he had said, that her stame was like that of an “tower,” it would have been as poetical as if he had compared her to a tree.

is an instance of an artificial image to express a moral superiority. But Solomon, it is probable, did not compare his beloved’s nose to a “tower” on account of its length, but of its symmetry; and, making allowance for Eastern difficulty of finding a discreet image for a female nose in nature, it is perhaps as good a figure as any other.

Art is not inferior to nature for poetical purposes. What makes a regiment of soldiers a more noble object of view than the same mass of mob? Their arms, their dresses, their banners, and the art and artificial symmetry of their position and movements. A Highland chieftain, a Mamelon’s turban, and a Roman toga, are more poetical than the tattooed or untattooed buttocks of a New Sandwich savage, although they were described by William Wordsworth himself like the “todd in his glory. I have seen as many magnificent as most men, and more fleets than the generality of landsmen: and, to my mind, a large convoy, with a few sail of the line to conduct them, is as noble and as poetical a prospect as all that inanimate nature can produce. I prefer the “most of some great admiral,” with all its tackle, to the Scotch fir or the Alpine tannen, and think that more poetry has been made out of it.

In what does the infinite superiority of ‘Falconer’s Shipwreck,’ over all other shipwrecks, consist? In his admirable application of the terms of his art; in a poet-sailor’s description of the sailor’s fate. These very terms, by his application, make the strength and reality of his poetical art. Why? because he was a poet, and in the hands of a poet art will not be found less ornamental than nature. It is precisely in general nature, and in stepping out of it, that Falconer fails; where he depresses to speak of ancient Greece, and ‘such branches of learning.’

In Dyer’s Grongar Hill, upon which his fame rests, the very appearance of Nature herself is moralized into an artificial image:

“Thou is Nature’s nature wrought,
To instruct our wandering thought.
That she dresst green and gray,
To dispense our cares away.”

And here also we have the telescope, the misuse of which, from Milton, has rendered Mr. Bowles so triumphant over Mr. Campbell:

“Sc we miswe the sunne’s face, Eyed through hope’s deluding glass.”

And here a word, en passant, to Mr. Campbell:

“As ye summate, sweet and fair,
Cled in colors of the air,
Which to those who journey near,
Bemore, brown, brown, and rough appear,
Still we trave the same coarse way—
The present’s still a cloudy day.”

We are told that the original of the far-famed,

“The distance lends enchantment to the view,
And robes the mountains in its azure hue.”
LETTER TO JOHN MURRAY ON BOWLES'S STRictures ON POPE. 1043

Wore Petrarch to be ranked according to the order of his compositions, where would the best stand? He could hardly stand lower. Dante's powers were higher, but not for Jehovah. The subject altogether was essentially unpoetical; he has made more of it than another could, but it is beyond him and all men. Here is a portion of his reply, Mr. Bowles asserts that Pope "envied Phillips," because he quizzed it, pastoral in the Guardian, in that most admirable model of irony, his paper on the subject. If there were any thing in Phillips, it could hardly be his pastorals. They were commonplace, and Pope expressed his contempt. If Mr. Fitzgerald published a volume of sonnets, or a "Spirit of Discovery," or a "Missionary," and Mr. Bowles wrote in any periodical journal an ironical paper upon them, would this be "envy?" The authors of the "Rejected Addresses" have ridiculed the sixteen or twenty "first living poets" of the day; but do they "envy" them? "Envy" writes, it don't laugh. The authors of the "Rejected Addresses" may despise some, but they can hardly "envy" any of the persons whom they have parodied; and Pope could have no more envied Phillips than he did Wolstede. Theobald, or any other given hero of the Dunciad. He could not have envied him, even had he himself not been the greatest poet of his age. Did Mr. Ings "envy" Mr. Phillips, if he asked him to "walk" with Tyrannus to drive ozen, and say, I am goaded on by love? This question silenced poor Phillips: but it no more proceeded from "envy" than did Pope's ridicule. Did he envy Swift? Did he envy Boling broke? Did he envy Gray the unparalleled success of his "Beggars' Opera?" We may be answered that these were his friends—true; but does friendship prevent envy? Study the first woman you meet with, or the first scribbler you see, and tell me himself (whom I acquaint fully of such an odious quality) study some of his own poetical intimates the most envious man I ever heard of is a poet, and high one; besides it is an universal passion. Goldsmith envied not only the puppets for their dancing, and broke his shins in the attempt at rivalry, but was seriously because two pretty woman received more attention than he. This is envy, but where does Pope say a sign, or his passion? In that case, Dryden envied the hero of his Mac Flecknoe. Mr. Bowles compares, when and where he can, Pope with Cowper, (the same Cowper whom, in his edition of Pope, he demotes at his attaching it to his attachment and search, and you will find it; I remember the passage, though not the page,) in particular he re quotes Cowper's Dutch delineation of a wood, drawn up like a seedman's catalogue,* with an adject

Imitation of Milton's style, as burlesque as the "Splendid Shilling." These two writers (for Cowper is no poet) come into comparison in one great work—the translation of Homer. Now, with all the great, and manifest, and manifold, and improved, and acknowledged beauties of Pope's translation, and all the scholarship, and pains, and time, and trouble, and blank verse of the other, who can ever read Cowper? and who will ever lay down, for the one's sake; Pope's was "not Homer, it was Spondanus;" but Cowper's is not Homer, either, it is not even Cowper. As a child I first read Pope's Homer with a rapture which subsequent years of education never offer'd; and children are not the worst judges of their language. As a man I read Homer in the original, as we have all done, some of us by force, and a few by favor; under which description I come is nothing to the purpose, it is enough that I read him. As a man I have tried to read Cowper's version, and I found it impossible. Has any human reader ever succeeded? And now that we have heard the Catholic re-preached with envy, duplicity, licentiousness, avarice—what was the Calvinist? He attempted the most atrocious of crimes in the Christian code, viz., suicide—and why? Because he was to be examined whether he was fit for an office which he seems to wish to have made a sluicerie. His connexion with Mrs. Unwin was pure enough, for the old lady was devout, and he was deranged; but why then is the inforin and then elderly Pope to be reproved on a connexion with Martha Blow? Cowper was the almoner of Mrs. Throgmorton; but Pope's charities were his own, and they were noble and extensive, far beyond his fortune's warrant. Pope was the tolerant yet steady adherent of the most bigoted of sects; and Cowper the most bigoted and despondent sectary that ever anticipated damnation to himself or others. Is this harsh? I know it is, and I do not assert it as my opinion of Cowper personally, but to show what might be said with just as great an appearance of truth and candor, as all the odium which has been accumulated upon Pope in similar speculations. Cowper was a good man, and lived at a fortunate time for his works.

Mr. Bowles, apparently not relying entirely upon his own arguments, has, in person or by proxy, sought for the names of Southey and Moore. Mr. Southey, entirely apart from Mr. Bowles's "invariable principles of poetry." The least that Mr. Bowles can do in return is to approve the "invariable principles of Mr. Southey." I should have thought that the word "invariable" might suit Southey's throat, like Macbeth's "Amen!" I am sure it did in mine, and I am not the least consistent of the two, at least as a voter. Moore (et tu Brute?) also approves, and a Mr. J. Scott. There is a letter also of two lines from a have tried to read Cowper's version, and I found it impossible. Has any human reader ever succeeded? There are those who will believe this, and those who will not. You, sir, know how far I am sincere, and whether my opinion, not only in the short work intended for publication, and in private letters which can never be published, has or has not been the same. I look upon this as the declining age of the English poetry; no regard for others, no selfish feeling can prevent me from seeing this, and expressing the truth. There can be no worse sign for the future of the times than the depreciation of Pope. It would be better to receive for proof Mr. Cockett's rough but strong attack upon Shakespeare and Milton, than to allow this smooth and "candid" undermining of the reputation of the most perfect of our poets, the purest of our realists. Of his power in the passions, in description, in the mock-heroic, I leave others to decent. I take him on his strong ground, as an ethical poet: in the former case one may distinguish the mock-heroic and the solemn equal; and in my mind, the latter is the highest of all poetry, because it does that in verse, which the greatest of men have wished to accomplish in prose. If the essence of poetry must be a lie, throw it to the dogs, or banish it from your republic, as Plato would have done. He who can reconcile poetry with truth and wisdom, is the only true poet in its real sense; the moral, the poet, 'the creator'—why must this mean the "liar," the "feignor," "the tale-teller?" A man may make and create better things than those. I shall not presume to say that Pope is as high a poet as Shakespeare, though his Milton, through his Warton, places him immediately under them. I would no more say this than I would assert in the mosque, (once St. Sophia's,) that Socrates was a greater man than Mahomet. But if I say that he is very superior to the latter, then has been asserted of Burns, who is supposed "To rival all but Shakespeare's come below." I say nothing against this opinion. But of what "order," according to the poetical aristocracy, are Burns' poems? These are his opus majus, that of a poet of no mean order, "The Cotter's Saturday Night," a descriptive sketch, some others in the same style; the rest are songs. So much for the rank of his productions; the rank of Burns is the very first of his art. Of Pope I have expressed my opinion elsewhere, as also of the effect which the present attempts at poetry have had upon our literature. If any great national or natural convulsion could or should overwhelm our country, in such sort as to sweep Great Britain from the kingdoms of the earth, and leave only that, after all the most living of human things, a dead language, to be studied and read, and imitated, but not passed and preserved for future and far generations upon foreign shores; if your literature should become the learning of mankind, divested of party cabals, transient fashions, and national pride and prejudice; an Englishman, anything like the first of his nation, who, with the precept of the English school, can show that there had been such a thing as a British Epic and Tragedy, might wish for the preservation of Shakespeare and Milton; but the surviving world would probably not have the same taste, and the respect would sink with the people. He is the moral poet of all civilization, and, as such, let us hope that he will one day be the national poet of mankind. He is the only poet that never shocks; the only poet whose faultlessness has been made his reproach. Cast your eye over his productions; consider their extent, and contemplate their variety:—pastoral, passion, mock-heroic, translation, satire, ethelis, all that can possibly be there is a place for him to be his melody, how comes it that foreigners adore him even in their diluted translation? But I have made this letter too long. Give my compliments to Mr. Bowles.

Yours ever, very truly,

BYRON.

To J. Murray, Esq.

Post scriptum.—Long as this letter has grown, I find it necessary to append a postscript,—if possible, a shorter one than Mr. Bowles desired. He has accused Pope of "a sordid money-getting passion;" but he adds "if I had ever done so, I should be glad to find any testimony that might show me he was not so." This testimony he may find to his heart's content, in Spence and the others. But he will find there Martha Blount, who, Mr. Bowles charitably says, "probably thought he did not save enough for her as legatee." Whatever she thought upon this point, her words are in Pope's favor. There then is Alderman Barber—see Spence's Anecdotes. There is Pope's cold answer to Halifax, when he proposed a pension; his behavior to Craggs and to Addison upon like occasions; and his own two lives—

"And, uncle to Homer, since I live and dying,
I might be praised, or be revil'd, if my life or dying were written when princes would have been prou'd to pencil, and peers to promote him, and when the whole army of dunces were in array against him, and would have been too happy to deprive him of this feast of independence. But there is something a little more serious in Mr. Bowles's declaration, that he "would have spoken" of his "noble generosity to the outage, Richard Savage," and other instances of a compassionate and generous heart, "had they occurred to his recollection when he wrote." What is it come to this? Does Mr.
Bowles sit down to write a minute and laborod life and edition of a great poet: Does he anatomize his character, his opinions, and his weaknesses with his faults and with his foibles? Does he sneer at his feelings, and doubt of his sincerity? Does he unfold his vanity and duplicity? and then omit the good qualities which might, in part, have "had they occurred to his recollection when he wrote." Is this the frame of mind and of memory with which the illustrious dead are to be reproached? If Mr. Bowles, when he pronounced that the mean of refreshing his memory, did not recollect these facts, he is unfit for his task; but if he did recollect, and omit them, I know not what he is fit for, but I know what he will be fit for. Is the plea of "not recollecting" such a thing as to excuse
Mr. Bowles? Mr. Bowles has been at a public school, and, as I have been publicly educated also, I can sympathize with his predection. When we were in the third form even, had we pleaded on the Monday morning, it would have been a fine in view of Mr. Bowles's exercise because "we had forgotten it," what would have been the reply? And is an excuse, which would not be pardon'd to a schoolboy, to pass.
And I can see no reason in a man of sense either to the name of the first poet of his age, if not of his country? If Mr. Bowles so readily forgets the virtues of others, why complain so grievously that others have a better memory for his own faults? They are but the faults of an author: Dr. Johnson has been imiteted from his catalogue are essential to the justice due to a man.

Mr. Bowles appears, indeed, to be susceptible beyond the privilege of authorship. There is a plausible dedication to Mr. Gifford, in which he is made responsible for all the articles of the Quarterly. Mr. Southey, it seems, "the most able and eloquent writer in that Review," approves of Mr.
Bowles's publication. Now, it seems to me to the more impartial, that notwithstanding that the great writer of the Quarterly entertains opinions opposite to the able article on Spence, nevertheless that essay may be read with profit, to the opinions of any one man? Must it not vary according to circumstances, and according to the subjects to be criticised? I fear that writers must take the sweets and bitters of the public journals as they occur, and as the author of so much praise Mr. Bowles might have become accustomed to such incidents; he might be angry, but not astonished. I have been reviewed in the Quarterly almost as often as Mr. Bowles, and have had as pleasant things said, and some as unpleasant, as could well be pronounced. In the review of "The Fall of Jerusalem," it is stated that I have devoted "my powers, etc., to the worst parts of manicheism," which, being interpreted, means that I worship the false.
Mr. Bowles has neither written a reply, nor complained to Gifford. I believe that I observed in a letter to you, that I thought "that the critic might have praised Milman without finding it necessary to abuse me," but I did not add at the same time, or soon after, (apropos, of the note in the book of travels,) that I would not, if it were even in my power, have a single line cancelled on my account in that or in any other public review. Of course, I do not mean to myself the privilege of response when necessary. Mr.
Bowles seems in a whimsical state about the article on Spence. You know very well that I am not in your confidence in all that of Spence's journal.
The moment I saw that article, I was morally certain that I knew the author "by his style." You will tell me that I do not know him: that is all as it should be: keep the secret; so shall I, though no one has ever intrusted it to me. He is not the person whom Mr. Bowles denounces.
Mr. Bowles's extreme sensibility reminds me of a circumstance which occurred on board of a frigate, in which I was a passenger and guest of the captain's for a considerable time. The surgeon on board, a very gentlemanly young man, and remarkably able in his profession, wore a wig. Upon this ornament he was extremely pleased, and his tragic and jests are sometimes a little rough, his brother officers made occasional allusions to this delicate appendage to the doctor's person. One day a young lieutenant, in the course of a facetious discussion, said, "Suppose you were to wear the wig: I shall laugh in the face of the surgeon." "Sir," replied the doctor, "I shall talk no longer with you; you grow scurrilous." He would not even admit so near an approach as to the hat, which he wore. It is the more difficult to imagine Mr. Bowles's laurels, even in his outside capacity of an editor, "they grow scurrilous." You say that you are about to prepare an edition of Pope; you cannot do better for your own credit as a publisher, and for the reputation of the works, and of the public taste from rapid degeneracy.
NOTES.

I.

The Italians, with the most poetical language, and the most fictitious taste in Europe, possess now five great poets, they say, Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, Tasso, and lastly Alberi. Page 1042.

Of these there is one ranked with the others for his Sonnets, and two for compositions which belong to no class at all! Where is Dante? His poem is not an epic; then what is it? He himself calls it a "divine comedy:" and why? This is more than all his thousand commentators have been able to explain. Ariosto is not an epic poem; and if poets are to be classed according to the genus of their poetry, where is he to be placed? Of these five, Tasso and Alberi only come within Aristotle's arrangement, and Mr. Bowles's class-book. But the whole position is false: Poets are classed by the power of their performance, and not according to its rank in a gradus. In the contrary case, the forgotten epic poets of all countries would rank above Petrarch, Dante, Ariosto, Burns, Gray, Dryden, and the highest names of various countries. Mr. Bowles's title of "invariable principles of poetry," is, perhaps, the most arrogant ever prefixed to a volume. So far are the principles of poetry from being "invariable," that they never were nor never will be settled. These "principles" mean nothing more than the predilections of a particular age; and every age has its own, and a different from its predecessor. It is now Homer and now Virgil; once Dryden, and since Walter Scott; now Corneille, and now Racine; now Grevil, now Voltaire. The Homerists and Virgilians in France disputed for half a century. Not fifty years ago the Italians neglected Dante—Bettinelli reproved Moun for reading "that barbarian," at present they adore him. Shakespeare and Milton have had their rise, and they will have their decline. Already they have more than once fluctuated, as must be the case with all the dramatists and poets of a living language. This does not depend upon their merits, but upon the ordinary vicissitudes of human opinions. Schlegel and Madame de Staël have endeavored also to reduce poetry to two systems, classic and romantic. The effect is only beginning.

I shall not presume to say that Pope is as high a poet as Shakespeare and Milton, though his enemy, Warton, places him immediately under them. Page 1044.

If the opinions cited by Mr. Bowles, of Dr. Johnson against Pope, are to be taken as decisive authority, they will also hold good against Gray, Milton, Swift, Thomson, and Dryden: in that case what becomes of Gray's poetical and Milton's moral character? even of Milton's poetical character, or, indeed, of English poetry in general? For Johnson strips many a leaf from every laurel. Still Johnson's is the finest critical work extant, and can never be read without instruction and delight.

OBSERVATIONS UPON "OBSERVATIONS."

A SECOND LETTER TO JOHN MURRAY, ESQ.

ON THE REV. W. L. BOWLES'S STRICITONS ON THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF POPE.

Boswell, March 23, 1821.

DEAR SIR,

In the further "Observations" of Mr. Bowles, in rejoinder to the charges brought against his edition of Pope, it is to be regretted that he has lost his temper. Whatever the language of his antagonists may have been, I fear that his replies have afforded more pleasure to them than to the public. That Mr. Bowles should not be pleased is natural, whether right or wrong; but a temperate defence would have answered his purpose in the former case—and, in the latter, no defence, however violent, can tend to any thing but his discomfiture. I have read over this third pamphlet, which you have been so obliging as to send me, and shall venture a few observations, in addition to those upon the previous controversy.

Mr. Bowles sets out with repeating his "confirmed assertion," that "what he said of the moral part of Pope's character, was, generally speaking, true; and that the principles of poetical criticism which he has laid down are invariable and invulnerable."

&c.; and that he is the more persuaded of this by the "exaggerations of his opponents." This is all very well, and highly natural and sincere. Nobly ever expected that either Mr. Bowles or any other author, would be convinced of human fallibility in their own persons. But it is nothing to the purpose—for it is not what Mr. Bowles thinks, but what is to be thought of Pope—that is the question. It is what he has asserted or insinuated against a man which is the patrimony of posterity, that is to be tried; and Mr. Bowles, as a party, can be no judge. The more he is persuaded, the better for himself, if it give him any pleasure; but he can only persuade others by the proofs brought out in his defence. After these preludary remarks of "conviction," &c., Mr. Bowles proceeds to Mr. Gilchrist; whom he charges with "slang" and "slander," besides a small subsidary indictment of "abuse, ignorance, malice," and so forth. Mr. Gilchrist has, indeed, shown some anger; but it is an honest indignation, which rises up in defence of the illustrious dead. It is a generous rage which interposes between our ashes and their disturbers. There appears also to have been some slight personal provocation. Mr. Gilchrist, with a chivalrous disdain of the fury of an incensed poet, put his name to a letter avowing the publication of a former essay in defence of Pope, and consequently of an attack upon Mr. Bowles. Mr. Bowles appeals to be angry with Mr. Gilchrist for four reasons—firstly, because he wrote an article in "The London Magazine;" secondly, because he considered it; thirdly, that he was the author of a still more extended article in "The Quarterly Review;" and, fourthly, because he was not the author of the said Quarterly article, and had not condemned or repudiated it. Mr. Bowles had no earthly reason but because he had not written it.

Mr. Bowles declares, that "he will not enter into a particular examination of the pamphlet," which is a misnomer if called "Gilchrist's Answer to Bowles," when it should have been called "Gilchrist's Abuse of Bowles." On this error in the baptism of Mr. Gilchrist's pamphlet, it may be observed, that an answer may be abusive and yet no less an answer, though indisputably a bad one, and better of the two; but if abuse is to cancel all pretensions to reply, what becomes of Mr. Bowles's answers to Mr. Gilchrist? Bowles accordingly says—"But as Mr. Gilchrist derides my peculiar sensitiveness to criticism, before I show how destitute of truth is this representation, I will here explicitly declare the only grounds, &c., &c., Mr. Gilchrist's sensitiveness in denouncing his papers to be abusive, and yet perhaps too much. But if he has been so charged, and truly—what then? There is no moral turpitude in such sensitiveness of feeling: it has been, and may be, combined with many good and great qualities. Is Mr. Bowles a poet or is he not? If he be, he must, from his very essence, be sensitive to criticism; and even if he be not, he need not be ashamed of the common requisite to being attacked. All that is to be wished for, that in "proper" mode and "disagreeable thing it is, before he assailed the greatest moral poet of any age, or in any language. Pope himself "sleeps well."—nothing can touch him further; but those who love the honor of their country, the perfection of her literature, the glory of her language—are not to be expected to permit an atom of his dust to be stirred in his tomb, or a leaf to be stripped from the laurel which grows over his ashes. Mr. Bowles assigns several reasons why and when "an author is justified in appealing to every upright and honorable mind in the kingdom." If Mr. Bowles limits the perusal of his defence to the "upright and honorable mind in the kingdom," he can certainly be extensively circulated. I should rather hope that some of the downright and dishonest will read and be converted, or convicted. But the whole of his reasoning is here superfluous—"an author is justified in appealing," &c., when and why he pleases, let him make out a tolerable case, and few of his readers will quarrel with his motives.

Mr. Bowles will now plainly set before the literature of the country, the perils of his own character. If there is a case which is more honorable to Mr. Gilchrist than another it is, that being engaged in commerce he had the taste, and found the leisure, to become so able a proficient in the higher literature of his country; other of his characters but Mr. Bowles should have written "Mr. Gilchrist's name and his..."

This point he wishes particularly to address to the most respectable characters, who have the direction and management of the minds of the critical press." That the press may be, in some instances, conducted by respectable characters is probable enough; but if they are so, there is no occasion to tell them of it if they not, it is a base adulation. In either case, it looks like a kind of flattery, by which the gentry are not very likely to be offended, since it would be difficult to find two passages in fifteen pages more at variance, than Mr. Bowles's prose at the beginning of this pamphlet, and his verse at the end of it. In page 4, he speaks of "those most respectable characters who have the direction, &c., of the periodical press," and in page 10, we find—

"Ye dark iniquities, a monk-like hand, 0' thine flame snuffing victor's head, A scheme, sneer, and sinister brood, Only verdict in your eyes, and hood,"

And so on—to "bloody law" and "red scourges," with other similar phrases, which may not be altogether agreeable to the above-mentioned "most respectable characters." Mr. Gilchrist concludes my observations in the last Pamphleteer with feelings not unsink'd towards Mr. Gilchrist, or "[it should be nor] to the author of the review of Spence, be he whom he might.

"I was in hopes as I have always been ready to admit any errors I might have been led into, or prejudice I might have entertained, that even Mr. Gilchrist might be disposed to a more amicable mode of discussing what I had advanced in regard to Pope's moral and universal prejudices. As Major Sturgeon observes, "There never was a set of more amicable officers—"with the exception of a boxing-bout between Captain Shelk and the Colone..."

A page and a half—may only a page before—Mr. Bowles reaffirms his conviction, that "what he has said of Pope's moral character is (generally speaking) true, and that his "poetical principles are carried to an extent at which no one can accuse me of having been guilty of literary or moral excess.

Mr. Bowles has since read a publication by him (Mr. Gilchrist) containing such vulgar slander, affecting private life and character," &c., &c.; and Mr. Gilchrist has also had the advantage of reading a publication by Mr. Bowles sufficiently imbued with personal animosity, etc. One of the most popular and principal topics of reproach is that he is a "grocer, that he has a "pipe in his mouth, ledger-book, green canisters, dingy shop-boy, half a hog's head of brown turtle," &c, Nay, the same little railly is with the "very title-page of a book which he has written, it is not so strongly censured as the one published by Mr. Bowles, but that time commenced upon this foot, as Dr. Johnson said to Dr. Percy, "Sir, there is an end of politeness—we are to be as rude as we please—Sir, you said that I was short-sighted. As a man's profession is generally no more in his own power than his person—both having been made out for him—it is hard that he should be reproached with either, and still more that an honest calling should be more honorable to Mr. Gilchrist than another it is, that being engaged in commerce he had the taste, and found the leisure, to become so able a proficient in the higher literature of his country; other of his characters but Mr. Bowles who will be proud to own Glover, Chatterton, Burns, and Bloomfield for his peers, should hardly have quarrelled with Mr. Gilchrist for his criticism. Mr. Gilchrist's stock is enervated in regard to the highest civic honors, and to boundless wealth, has nothing to require apology; but ever if it had, such a reproach was not very disgraceful on the part of a clergyman, nor graceful on that of a gentleman. But, as compared to "Christian criticism" is not particularly happy, especially where Mr. Gilchrist is accused of having "set the first example of this mode in Europe." What pagan criticism may have been we know but little: the names of Zolli..." and Aristarchus survive, and the works of Aristotle, Longinus, and Quintilian: but of "Christian criticism" we have already had some specimens in the works of Bishop of London, Philip Dormer, Archbishops of Salamanca, the Crusentii (versus Tasso), the French Academy (against the Old), and the antagonists of Voltaire and of Pope—to say nothing of some articles of various journals. It is a pity that Mr. Bowles cannot witness some of the Italian controversy, or become the subject of one. He would then look upon Mr. Gilchrist as a panegyrist.

To me it appears of no very great consequence whether Martha Blount was or was not Pope's mistress, though I could have wished him a better. She appears to have been a cold-hearted, interested, ignoble woman, without love in him the tenderness of Pope's heart in the desolation of his latter days was cast away, not knowing whither to turn, as he drew towards his premature old age, childless and lonely,—like the needle which, approaching a certain distance of the pole, becomes helpless and useless, and, ceasing to tremble, rusts. She seems to have been so totally unworthy of tenderness, that it is an additional proof of the kindness of Pope's heart to have been able to love such a being. But we must love something. I agree with Mr. B. that she "could at no time have regarded Pope personally with attachment," because she was incapable of attachment; but I deny that Pope could not be regarded with a certain degree of attachment by a worthy woman. It is not probable, indeed, that a woman would have fallen in love with him as he walked along the Mall, or in a box at the opera, nor from a balcony, in a ball-room; but in society she seems to have been as amiable as unassuming, and, with the greatest disadvantages of figure, his head and face were remarkably handsome, especially his eyes. He was adored by his friends; and, if the most opposite dispositions, ages, and talents,—by the old and wayward Wycherley, by the cynical Swift, the rough Atterbury, the gentle Spence, the stern attorney—bishop Warburton, the quiet, wise, and bigoted Bolingbroke, the inquisitive and cantankerous Sir William. Bolingbroke wept over him like a child; and Spence's description of his last moments is at least as edifying as the more ostentatious account of the death-bed of Addison. The viscount of Peterborough and the poet Gay, the witty Congreve and the laughing Rowe, the eccentric Cromwell and the steady Bathurst, were all his intimates. The man who could conciliate so many men of the most opposite description, not one of whom but was a remarkable or a celebrated character, might well have pretended to all the attachment which a reasonable man would desire of an amiable woman.

I would, however, recommend this rigor to publish women in general, in the hope of securing the glory of two suicides a-piece. I believe that there are few men who, considering the observations on life, may not have perceived that it is not the greatest female beauty who forms the longest and the strongest passions.

But, upon Pope.—Voltaire tells us that the Marchal Luxemburg (who had precisely Pope's figure) was not only somewhat too amatory for a great man, but fortunate in his attachments. Le Valier, the passion of Louis XIV., had an unexampled devotion to a personage, as indifferent to his appearance and actions as the mistresses of Philip II. of Spain, and Maugiron, the minion of Henry III. of France, had each of them lost an eye; and the famous Latin epigram was written upon them, which has, I believe, been either translated or imitated by Goldsmith—

"Lambani anor drennt, capta ex Lenellea miderro, Et poeta fors vicino membro Doe;
Blande puer, mutu quaede habendo soror,
Sic te censeo Amor, sic et illa Venus."

Wilkes, with his ugliness, used to say that "he was but a quarter of an hour behind the handsomest man in England," and it is plain that he and the most unexampled passions upon record—Vanessa's and Stella's—

"Vanessa, aged mother a more, Sight for a crown of fancy face."

He required them bitterly, for he seems to have broken the heart of the one, and worn out that of the other; and he had his reward, for he died a solitary idiot in the hands of servants.

For my own part, I am of the opinion of Pausanias, that success in love depends upon Fortune. "They particularly move those walls of Venus which their temple, &c., &c., &c. I remember, too, to have seen a building in Agina in which there is a statue of Fortune, holding a horn of Amalthea; and near there is a winged Love. The meaning of this is, that the success of men in love affairs depends more on the assistance of Fortune than on the charms of beauty, I am persuaded, too, with Pindar (to whom I submit in other particulars) that Fortune is one of the Fates and that certain respect she is more powerful than her sisters."

Grimm's "Romance," which is no different in kind than the different destinations of the younger Crebillon and Rousseau. The former writes a licentious novel, and a young English girl of some fortune and family (a Miss Stratford) runs away, and crosses the sea to marry him; while Rousseau, the most tender and passionate of lovers, is obliged to espouse his chambermaid. If I recollect rightly, this remark was also repeated in the Edinburgh Review of Grimm's corresp, seven or eight years ago.

In regard to the strange mixture of indecent and sometimes profane levity, which his conduct and language often exhibited, and which so much shocks Mr. W. and makes him talk of the inconstant word "often;" and in extenuation of the occasional occurrence of such language it is to be collected, that it was less the tone of Pope, than the tone of the time. With the exception of the correspondence of Pope and the friends, and many private letters of the period have come down to us; but those, such as they are—fewer, scattered scraps from Farquhar and others—are more indecent and coarse than any thing in Pope's letters. So Madame de Congreve, Vanbrugh, Farquhar, Ciber, &c., which naturally attempted to represent the manners and conversation of private life, are decisive upon this point; as are also some letters to different admirers (one an elderly gentleman) killed themselves in despair (see Lady Morgan's "France.")" of the country, was at his own table, and his excuse for his licentious language, viz., "that every body understood that, but few could talk rationally upon less common topics." The refinement of latter days,—which is perhaps the consequence of vice, which is the offspring of an abstinence from the bread of civilization,—had not yet made sufficient progress. Even Johnson, in his "London," has two or three passages which cannot be read aloud, and Addison's "Drummer" some inelastic allusions.

To return to Mr. Bowles. "If what is here extracted can excite in the mind (I will not say of any "hayman," of any "Christian," but of any human being), &c., &c., is not Mr. Gilchrest a "human being?" Mr. Bowles asks "whether in attributing _an article," &c., &c., "to the critic, he had any reason for distinguishing him with that courtesy," &c., &c. But Mr. Bowles was wrong in attributing the article to Mr. Gilchrest at all; and would have not been right in calling him a dunce and a grocer, if he had written it.

Mr. Bowles is here peremptorily called upon to proieve the fact of which gives him the grieved resentment,—the mention of a letter he received from the editor of "The London Magazine." Mr. Bowles seems to have embodied himself on all sides; — whether as writer, or reviser, or criticizing, or reviewing,—it had been an awkward affair for him.

Poor Scott is now no more. In the exercise of his vocation, he contrived at last to make himself the subject of acorner's inquest. But he died like a brave man, and he lived in an age. I knew him personally, though slightly. Although several years my senior, we had been schoolfellows together at the "grammar-school" (or, as the Aberdeenians pronounce it, "parson"), of New Aberdeen. He did not behave to me quite handsomely in his cap-sistency of editor a few years ago, but he was under no obligation to behave otherwise. The moment was too tempting for many friends, and for all enemies.
At a time when any relations (save one) fell from me like leaves from the tree in autumn winds, and your friends became still fewer,—when the whole periodical press (I mean the daily and weekly, not the diary press) was let loose against me in every shape of reproach, with the two strange exceptions (from their usual opposition) of "The Courier" and "The Examiner,"—the paper of which Scott had the direction was neither the last nor the least vituperative. Its articles were, when it was bowed in griefs, by the loss of his son, and known by experience, the bitterness of domestic privation. He was then earnest with me to return to England, and on my refusal, with smile, that he was once of a different opinion, he replied to me, "that he and others had been greatly misled; and that some pains, and rather extraordinary means, had been taken to excite them." Scott is a sphere, but there are more than one living, who were present at this dialogue. He was a man of very considerable talents, and of great requirements. He had made his way, as a literary character, with such success, and in such great years.
 poor fellow! I recollect his joy at some appointment which he had obtained, or was to obtain, through Mr. James Mackintosh, and which, without the _further extension (unless by a trip run to Rome) of his travels, I felt certain he would conduct him.
Peace be with him!—and may all such other faults as are inevitable to humanity be as readily forgiven him, as the little injury which he did unto one who respected his talents, and regrets his loss.

I pass over Mr. Bowles's page of explanation, upon the correspondence between him and Mr.
F—.

It is of little importance in regard to Pope, and consequently in regard to the kind of diction of Mr. Gilchrest's. We now come to a point where Mr. Gilchrest has, certainly, rather exaggerated matters; and, of course, Mr. Bowles makes the most of it. Capital letters, like Kent's name, "large upon the bill," are made use of six or seven times to express his sense of the outrage. The charge is, indeed, very boldly made: but, like "Randol of the Mist's" practical joke of putting the bread inside a fish, it is, so to speak, as Dugald Dalgetty says, "somewhat too wild and savage, besides wasting the good victuals."
Mr. Bowles appeals to the "Christian reader": upon this "Gilchristian criticism." Is not this play upon such words a "step beyond decorum" in a clergyman? But I admit the temptation of a pun to be irresistible.

But "a hasty pamphlet was published, in which some personalities respecting Mr. Gilchrest were suffered to appear." If Mr. Bowles will write "hasty pamphlets," why is he so surprised on receiving short answers? The grand grudge to which he perpetually returns is a charge of "Hypoochondriacism," asserted or insinuated in the Quarterly. I cannot conceive a man in perfect health being much affected by such a charge, because his complexion and conduct must amply refute it.
But if it were true, and that does it amount?—to the impeachment of a liver complaint. "I will tell it to the world," exclaimed the learned Smolenski.
You had better," said I, "tell it to your physician.

There is no necessary connexion between such a disease, which is more peculiarly the malady of students.
It has been the complaint of the good, and the wise, and the witty, and even of the gay. Regnard, the author of the last French comedy after Millev, was strainless; and Moliere himself, saturnine.
Dr. Johnson, Gray, and Burns, were all more or less fected by it occasionally. It was the prelude to the more awful malady of Collins, Cowper, Swift, and Smart; but it by no means follow that a partial affliction of this disorder is to terminate like theirs. But even were it so,—

"Nor brow, nor wisest, are exempt from this:
Polly—Polly's only free."

If this be the case, I will not remove the last of the pamphlets form a better certificate of sanity than a physician's. Mendehlson and Bayle were at times so overcome with this deposition, as to be obliged to recur to seeing "puppet-shows, and counting tiles upon the opposite houses," to divert their selves. Dr. Johnson at times "would have given a limb to recover his spirits." Mr. Bowles, who is (strangely enough) fond of quoting Pope, may perhaps answer,—

"Go on, obbliging creature, let me see All which descries my better men in me."

But the charge, such as it is, neither disgraces them nor him. It is easily disproved if false; and even if proved true, has nothing in it to make a man so very indignant. Mr. Bowles himself appears to be a little ashamed of his "hasty pamphlet," for he attempts to excuse it by the "great provocation;"
that is to say, by Mr. Bowles's supposing that Mr.
Gilchrest was the writer of the article in the Quarterly, which I have quoted, a which Mr. Pope refused.

"But, in extenuation, not only the great procrational said, but it ought to be said, that orders were sent to the London booksellers, that the most direct personal passages should be skeweled entirely, or what the proverb calls

"breaking a head and giving a plaster;" but, in this instance, the plaster was not spread in time, and Mr. Gilchrest does not seem at present disposed to regard Mr. Bowles's courteous reference to the spear of Achilles, which had such "skill in surgery."

But "Mr. Gilchrest has no right to object, as the reader will see." I am a reader, a "gentle reader," and I see much that is not according to the kind of Mr. Gilchrest's place, I should object exceedingly to being abused; firstly, for what I did write, and, secondly, for what I did not write; merely because it is Mr
Bowles’s will and pleasure to be as angry with me for having written in the London Magazine, as for not having written in the Quarterly Review. He said emphatically, "for he has, in his answer, said so and so," &c., &c. There is no great revenge in all this; and I presume that nobody either seeks or wishes it. What revenge? Mr. Bowles and the Quarterly Review are not poets, nor pretenders to poetry; therefore they can have no envy nor malice against Mr. Bowles; they have no acquaintance with Mr. Bowles, and can have no quarrel with his life and death, his profession or mode of life, nor he theirs. There is no political feud between them. What, then, can be the motive of their discussion of his deserts as an editor?—veneration for the genius of Pope, love for his memory, and regard for the classic glory of their country. Why would Mr. Bowles edict? Had he limited his honest endeavors to poetry, very little would have been said upon the subject, and nothing at all by his present antagonists.

Mr. Bowles calls the pamphlet a "mid-cart," and the writer a "scavenger." Afterwards he asks, "Shall he bing dirt and receive rose-water?" This means the Memoirs of Mr. Bowles, and the Memoirs of Mr. Gilchrist &c.; who, lamenting to Chamfort the shedding of blood during the French revolution, was answered, "Do you think that revolutions are to be made with rose-water?"

I presume that "rose-water" would be infinitely more graceful in the hands of Mr. Bowles than the substance which he has substituted for that delicate liquid. It would also more confound his adversary, supposing him a "scavenger." I remember, (and do you remember, reader, that it was in my earliest youth, "Console Plano,"—on the morning of the great battle, (the second)—between Guiley and Gregson, —Cribb, who was man to hold the lights, and in the same memorable day, waking me (a lodger at the inn in the next room) by a loud remonstrance to the waiter against the abomination of his towels, which had been laid in reverence. Cribb was a cool-heaven—and was much more discomfited by this odorous efficiency of fine linen, than by his adversary Horton, whom he "finished in style," though with some reluctance; for I recollect that he would not hold it beneath the dignity to be "scavenger;"—Horton being a very fine fresh-colored young man.

To return to "rose-water"—that is, to gentleness and respectability. Mr. Bowles revenge himself upon a hackney-coachman, when he has overcharged his fare? In case he should not, I will tell him. It is of little use to call him a "rascal, a scoundrel, a thief, an impostor, a black-guard, a villain, a ragamuffin, a—what you please," all that he is used to—it is his mother-tongue, and probably his mother's. But look him steadily and quietly in the face, and say—"Upon my word, I think you are the ugliest fellow I ever saw in my life," and he will instantly roll forth the brazen thunders of the charioteer Salomeus as follows:— "Hussy, what the h—l are you? You a gentleman! Why you Easy—why you much disorder it is to procure—and therefore to vindicate (for passion punishes him who feels it more than those whom the passions would excruciate)—by a few quiet words the aggressor, than by retorting violently. The "coals of fire of malice," says Mr. Bowles, are "benefits;"—but they are not the less "coals of fire." I pass over a page of quotation and quotation—

Sir up to my song "—oh let my little bark —not the Catapult, who says he has ample revenge against the Quarterly Review and himself"—"In-door avocations, indeed —"Kings of Brentford" "—One nosegay —Perennial nosegay" "—Oh Juvenes,"—and the like.

Page 12, producing the reasons, (the task supposed not to have been difficult as yet there were none)—"to show why Mr. Bowles attributed the critique in the Quarterly to Octavius Gilchrist. All these "reasons" consist of surmises of Mr. Bowles, upon the presumed character of his opponent. "He supposed, if the man in the kingdom so impudent, &c., &c., except Octavius Gilchrist."—"He did not think there was a man in the kingdom who would pretend ignorance, &c., &c., except Octavius Gilchrist." He did not conceive that the critic in the kingdom would so much stupid flippancy, &c., &c., except Octavius Gilchrist."—"He did not think there was one man in the kingdom, &c., &c., could so utterly misunderstand the meaning of Octavius Gilchrist."—"He did not believe there was a man in the kingdom so perfect Mr. Gilchrist's "old lunes," &c., &c.;—He did not think the mean mind of any one in the kingdom," &c., &c., and so on; always beginning with "any one in the kingdom, and ending with "Octavius Gilchrist," like the word in a catch. I am not in "the kingdom," and have not been much in the kingdom since I was one-and-twenty, (about five years in the whole, since I was of age), and have no desire to be in the kingdom whilst I breathe, nor to sleep there afterwards; and I regret nothing more than having never been in the kingdom. My antagonist must no longer a man in "the kingdom," let me hope that when I have ceased to exist, it may be said, as was answered by the master of Clanmorals's hackney, his day after the battle of Sheriff-Muir, when he was four years old among his children asked, "who was that?" he replied—"it was a man yesterday.

And in this capacity, "in or out of the kingdom," I must own that I participate in many of the obligations engendered by Mr. Gilchrist. I participate in his love of Pope, as I in his understanding, and occasionally finding fault with, the last editor of our last truly great poet.

One of the reproaches against Mr. Gilchrist, which he is, I believe, not to have made, is to have supposed that it—Mr. Bowles denies it: there it rests for the present. Mr. Bowles professes his dislike to Pope's duplicity, not to Pope—a distinction apparently without a difference. However, I believe that I understand him. We have a great dislike to Mr. Bowles's edition of Pope, but not to Mr. Bowles; nevertheless, he takes upon the subject as warmly as if it was personal. With regard to the fact of "Pope's duplicity," it remains to be proved—like Mr. Bowles's benevolence towards his memory.

In page 14, we have a large assertion, that "the Eloisa alone is sufficient to convict him of gross licentiousness." Thus, out it comes at last. Mr. Bowles accuses Pope of being a licentious poet, and grounds the charge upon a poem. The licentiousness is a "grand poet-ete," according to the turn of the times being. The grossness I deny. On the contrary, I do not suppose the course that never was, nor ever could be, treated by any poet with so much delicacy, mingled with, at the same time, such true and intense passion. Is the "Atys" not the Catapult, and Catullus is often a coarse writer. The subject is nearly the same, except that Atys was the suicide of his manhood, and Abelard the victim.

The "licentiousness" of the story was not Pope's—it was a story that had been carried on, but the gross, he has softened;—all that it had of indecency, he has purified;—all that it had of passionate, he has beautified;—all that it had of holy, he has elevated. Mr. Campbell has admirably marked this in a few words (1 quote from memory), in drawing the parallel between Dryden and Pope, when pointing out where Dryden was wanting. "I fear," says he, "that had the subject of 'Eloisa' fallen into his (Dryden's) hands, that he would have given us but a coarse draft of her passion." Never was the art of Pope more shewn as in this poem. With the facts and the letters of "Eloisa" he has done what no other mind but that of the best and purest of poets could have accomplished with such materials. We, Ovid (in the O'de called)—all that we have of ancient, all that we have of modern poetry, sinks into nothing compared with him in this production.

Let us hear no more of this trash about "licentiousness." Is not "Amorecon" taught in our schools?—translated, praised, and edited? Are no his Odes the amatory praises of a boy? Is not Sappho's Ode a girl? Is not this sublime and (according to Longinus) fierce love for one of her own sex? And is not Phillip's translation of it in the months of all your women? And are the English schools or the English women the more corrupt for all this? When you have thrown the ancients into the mire of this age to drive them mad—when you call "Licentiousness!"—"there's more real mischief and sapping licentiousness in a single French prose novel, in a Moravian hymn, or a German comedy, than in all the actual poetry that ever was penned, or poured forth, since the Rhapsody of Orpheus."

The sentimental anatomy of Rousseau and Mau de S. are far more formidable than any quantity of verse. They are so, because they sap the principles by reasoning upon the passions; whereas poetry is in itself passion, and does not systematise. It assails, but does not argue; it may be wrong, but it does not assume pretensions to Optimism.

Mr. Bowles now has the goodness "to point out the difference between a traducian and him who sincerely states what he sincerely believes." He might have spared himself the trouble. The one is a liar, who lies knowingly; the other (I speak of a scandalmonger of course) lies, charitably believing that he speaks truth, and very sorry to find himself in falsehood;—because he "Would rather that she deny should say,

Than his prediction prove a lie."

After a definition of a "traducian," which was quite superfluous (though it is agreeable to learn that Mr. Bowles so well understands the character), we are assured, that "he feels equally indifferent, Mr. Gilchrist, for what your manager can invent, or your impudence utter." This is intelligible; for it rests not only on Mr. Bowles's assurance, but on that of Sir Fretful Plagiary, and nearly in the same words,—"and I shall treat with it exactly the same calm indifference and philosophical contempt, and so your servant."

"One thing has given Mr. Bowles concern. It is a passage which might seem to reflect on the paternity of so many men as Monsieur, "Monsieur seen!" The passage alluded to expresses, that if Mr. Gilchrist be the reviewer of "a certain poet of nature," his praise and blame are equally contemptible. Mr. Bowles, who has a particularly ambiguous style, where it suits him, comes off with a "not to the poet, but the critic," &c. In my humble opinion, the passage referred to both. Had Mr. Bowles really meant fairly, he would have said so. His style would not have beguiled me into an illusion of the opposite. A "certain poet of nature" is not the style of commendation. It is the very prologue to the most scandalous paragraphs of the newspapers, which "will go to wound, and yet shun to strike."

"A certain high personage,"—"a certain peeress,"—"a certain illustrious foreigner,"—what do these words ever precede, but defamation? Had he felt a spark of kindling kindness for John Clare, he would have named him. There is a sneer in the first sentence of the following passage: "A deserving poet can "rather injure than promote his cause." It is difficult to comprehend. The article denounces is able and amiable, yet it says served the poet, as far as poetry can be served by judicious and honest criticism.

With the two next paragraphs of Mr. Bowles's pamphlet it is pleasing to concur. His mention of "Penny," and his former patronage of "Shook, and the monger of them," and, as if to change the subject, Mr. Bowles to be a benevolent man. I merely assert, that he is not a candid editor.

Mr. Bowles has been "a writer occasionally upwards of thirty years, and never wrote one word in reply in his life "to criticisms, merely as criticisms." This is Mr. Lofty in Goldsmith's Goodnatured Man; "and I vow by all that's honorable, my resentment has never done the men, as mere men, any service."—that is, as mere persons.

"The letter to the editor of the newspaper" is owned; but "it was not on account of the criticism. It was because the criticism came down in a frank directed to Mrs. Bowles!!"—(the italics and three points of a sentence underlined.) The paragraph is copied verbatim from the quotation, and Mr. Bowles was not displeased with the criticism, but with the frank and the address. I agree with Mr. Bowles that the intention was not to annoy him, but I fear that this was answered by his poet, when he hears the victim cry:—the adder is deaf.

The best reply to an anonymous intimation is to take no notice directly nor indirectly. I wish Mr. Bowles could see only one or two of the thousand which I have received in the course of a literary life, which, though begun early, has not yet extended to a third part of his existence as an author. I speak of literary life only. Were I to add personal, I might double the amount of anonymous letters. If he could but see the violence, the threats, the absurdity of the whole thing, he would laugh, and so should I, and thus be both gainers.

To keep up the farce,—within the last month of this present war (1831), I have seen Mr. Bowles threatened in the same way which menaced Mr. Bowles's fame,—excepting that the anonymous denunciation was addressed to the Cardinal Legate of France to Monsieur Roumage. To the head of to Mr. Bowles's time, as individuals, I believe, the elderly lady of the two. I append the menace in all its barbarie and literal Italian, that Mr. Bowles may be convinced; and as this is the only promise to pay, which the Italian ever keep, so my person has been at least as much exposed to a "shot in the gloaming," from "John Heatherblunter" (see Waverly), as ever Mr. Bowles's glory was from an editor. I am, therefore, of course ready, should Mr. Bowles have some heart or body, to appeal the matter to the forest daily; and this, because it was my "custom in the afternoon," and that I believe if the tyrant cannot escape amidst his guards (should it be so written?) the humour individual would prove the most effective use of any. Mr. Bowles has here the humility to say, that "he must succumb; for with Lord Byron turned against him, he has no chance,"—a declaration of this denial (to the denunciation of Mr. Bowles) of five lines afterwards, that "for every twenty-four lines quoted by Mr. Gilchrist, or his friend, to greet him with as many from the 'Gilchristiad;'" but so much the better. Mr. Bowles has no reason to succumb; for with Lord Byron turned against him, Mr. Bowles the author of 'The Missionary' may compete with the foremost of his contemporaries. Let it be recollected, that all my previous opinions of Mr.
Byron’s Works.

Bowles's poetry were written long before the publication of his last and best poem; and that a poet's last poem should be his best, is his highest praise. But, however, Mr. Bowles may rank with his living rivals, there never was so complete a proof of the superiority of Pope, as in the lines with which Mr. Bowles closes his "to be concluded" in his new work.

Mr. Bowles is awfully the champion and poet of nature. Art and the arts are dragged, some before, and others behind his chariot. Pope, where he deals with passion, and with the nature of the natural, is allowed, even by themselves, to be sublime; but they complain that too soon—— and there even they allow him to be unrivalled. He has succeeded, and even surpassed them, when he chose, in their own pretended province. Let us see what their Coryphaeus effects in Pope's. But it is too pitiable, it is too melancholy to see Mr. Bowles "siningy" not "up" but "down" as a poet to his lowest depth as an editor. By the way, Mr. Bowles is always quoting Pope, "warrant that there is no poet—not Shakspere himself—who can be so often quoted, with reference to life;—but his editor is so like the devil quoting Scripture, that I could wish Mr. Bowles in his proper place, quoting in the pursuit.

"He sought to truth and universal'd his song."

And now for his lines. But it is painful—painful —to see such a suicide, though at the shrine of Pope. I can't copy them all.——

"Shall the rank, loutishness of meanest of the age
Be like a night-mare grinning o'er a page?

Whose pre-conceived idea so aptly suit
The two extremes of boisterous and of brute,

Whose heart contends with thy Saturnian head,
A root ofbabel, and a lump of lead.

Glisten, procu'vel, &c., &c.

And thus stand forth, epic of thy wondrous form,
"To give thee his for his, or has thee limping house."

With regard to the last line, the only one upon which I shall venture for fear of infection, I would advise Mr. Gilchrest to keep out of the way of such reciprocal morsure—unless he has more faith in the "Drumskirk medicine" than most people, or may wish to the pension of the recent German professor, (I forget his name, but it is advertised and full of consonants,) who presented his memoir of an infallible remedy for the hydrophobia to the German diet last month, coupled with the phthisic condition of a large annuity, provided that his cure cured. Let him begin with the editor of Pope, and double his demand.

Yours ever,

Byron.

To John Murray, Esq.

P. S. Amongst the above-mentioned lines there occurs the following, applied to Pope—

"The assassin's vengeance, and the coward's lie."

And Mr. Bowles persists that he is a well-wisher of Pop.!! He has, then, edited an "assassin" and a "coward" wittingly, as well as lovingly. In my former letter I have remarked upon the editor’s forgetfulness of Pope's benevolence. But where he mentions his "tender, his generous

"His tears drop, but they do not blot them out."

"The recording angel" differs from the recording clergyman. A fulous editor is pardonable though tiresome, like to be had over, for generous and generous society would semi-deify his father. But a distracting editor is a parasite. He sins against the nature of his office, and connection—he murders the life to come of his victim. If his author is not worthy to be mentioned, do not edit at all: "The be, edit honestly, and even flatteringe. The reader will forgive the weakness in favor of mortality, and correct your adulation with a smile. But to sit down "mingere in patriots censure" Mr. Bowles has done, meriting a reprobaion so strong, that I am as incapable of expressing as of ceasing to feel it.

Further Addenda.

It is worthy of remark that, after all this outcry about "in-door nature" and "artificial images," Pope was the principal inventor of that boast of the natural. He divided this honor with Milton. Hear Warpton:—"It has come to pass that this enchanting art of modern gardening, in which this kingdom claims a preference over every nation in Europe, chiefly owes its origin and its improvements to two great poets, Milton and Pope."

Walpole (no friend to Pope) asserts that Pope formed Kent's taste, and that Kent was the artist to whom the English are chiefly indebted for diffusing a "taste in laying out grounds." The design of the Prince of Wales's garden at Twickenham, Warpton applauds "his singular effort of art and taste, in impressing so much variety and scenery on a spot of five acres." Pope was the man who ridiuled the Dutch, French, false and unnatural taste in gardening, both in prose and verse. (See, for the former, "The Gardunian.")

"Pope has given not only some of our first, but best rules and directions on Architecture and Gardening." (See Warpton's Essay, vol. ii. p. 237, &c., &c.)

Now, is it not a shame, after this, to hear our Lakers in "Kenilworth Green," and our Buccolical Cockneys, crying out (the latter in a wilderness of bricks and mortar) about "Nature," and Pope's "artificial in-door habits?" Pope had seen all of nature that England alone can supply. He was bred in Windsor pasture, and amidst the beautiful scenery of Eton; he lived familiarly and frequently at the country seats of Bathurst, Cobham, Burlington, Peterborough, Digby, and Bolingbroke; amongst whose seats was to be numbered Noice. He made his own little "five acres" a model to princes, and to the first of our artists who imitated nature. Warpton thinks "that the most engaging of Kent's works was also planned on the model of Pope's,—at least in the opening and retiring shades of Venus's Vale."

It is true that Pope was infirm and deformed; but he could walk, and he could ride, (he rode to Oxford from London in a chaise and dog-cart,) and he had eyes for an exquisite eye. On a tree at Lord Barthurst's is carved, "Here Pope sang,"—he composed beneath it. Bolingbroke, in one of his letters, represents them both, both, "in the hayfield. No one ever admired Nature more, or used her better, than Pope has done, as I will undertake to prove from his works, prose and verse, if not anticipated in so easy and agreeable a labor. I remember a passage in Walpole, and somewhere, of a gentleman who wished to give directions about some willows to a man who had long served Pope in his grounds: "I understand, sir," he replied: "you would have them hanging down, not growing up." He was right: nothing exists but this little anecdote, it would suffice to prove Pope's taste for Nature, and the impression which he had made on a common-minded man. But I have already quoted Warpton and Walpole (both his enemies) and, were it not es- sayary, I could simply quote Pope himself for such tributes to Nature as no poet of the present day has even approached.

His various excellences is really wonderful: architectural, painting, gardening, all are alike subject to his genius. Be it remembered, that English gardening is the perfect perfection of ingrrad Nature, and that without it England is but a hedge-and-ditch, double-post-and-rail, Hawkins.
Observations Upon "Observations."

Fl Heath and Clapham—Common sort of country, since the principal forests have been felled. It is, in general, far from a picturesque country. The case is different with Scotland, Wales, and Ireland; and I except also the lake countries and Derbyshire, together with Wiltshire, Berkshire, and my own district, Harrow on the Hill, and some spots near the coast. In the present rank fertility of "great poets of the age," and "schools of poetry," a word which, like "academy" and "philosophy," has never introduced till the decay of the art has increased with the number of its professors—in the present day, then, there have sprung up two sorts of Naturalists,—the Lakers, who whine about Nature because they live in Cumberland, and their undersec (which some one has maliciously called the "Cockney School," who are enthusiastic for the country because they live in London. It is to be observed, that the rustic founders are rather anxious to disclaim any connexion with their metropoli- tan followers, whom they ungraciously review, and call cockneys, atheists, foolish fellows, bad writers, and other hard names not less ungrateful than unmerited. The aquatic gentlemen of Windermere to what Mr. Braham terms "entusiasmy," for lakes, and moun- tains, and duffidols, and buttercups; but I should be disposed to call the foundation of the London pro- pensities of their imitative brethren to the same "high argument." Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge have rambled over half Europe, and seen Nature in most of her varieties, (although I think that they have occasionally not used her very well;) but what on earth,—of earth, and sea, and Nature—have the others seen? Not a half, nor a tenth part so much a Pope. While they sneer at Windsor Forest, has there ever seen any thing of Windsor except its brick? The most rural of these gentlemen is my friend Leigh Hunt, who lives at Hampstead. I believe that I need not disclaim any personal or poetical hostility against that gentleman. A more amiable man in society I know not; nor (when he will allow his sense to prevail over his sectarian principles) a better writer. When he was writing his "Remi- ni," I was not the last to discover its beauties, long before it was published. Even then I was convinced against its vulgarisms; which are the more extra- ordinary, because the author is any thing but a vulgar man. Mr. Hunt's answer was, that he wrote them because he had read a thousand lines of "his enemy!" I then said no more. When a man talks of his system, it is like a woman's talking of her vir- gins. Let them talk on. There are writers who can read Rimini, as it might have been written, I know not; but Mr. Hunt is, probably, the only poet who could have had the heart to spoil his own Capo d'Ora. With the rest of his young people I have no acquaintance, except through some things of theirs (which have been sent out without my desire,) and I confess that till I had read them I was not aware of the full extent of human absurdity. Like Gar- tuck's "Ode to Shakespeare," they are the very thing, he says, as they defy criticism. These are of the sort of "The Pope." Of course, of the Mr. J. Ketch, he has written some lines against him, of which it were better to be the sub- ject than the author. Mr. Hunt redeems himself by saying, "but the rest of these poor creatures seem so far gone that I would not "march through Coventry with them, that's flat!" were I in Mr. Hunt's place. To be sure, has he led his lambs against the wolves they will be well peppered;' but a system-maker might as well be proselytised when they have really seen life,—when they have felt it,—when they have travelled beyond the far distant boundaries of the wilds of Middlesex,—when they travel in the Alps and the Rhine, and are traced to its sources the Nile of the New River—then, and not till then, can it properly be permitted to them to despise Pope; who had, if not in Wales, manner and of his disciples, therefore, I will not judge of their manners from their verses. They may be honorable and gentlemanly men, for what I know; but the latter quality is studiously excluded from their publications. They remind me of Mr. Smith and the Miss Broughtons at the Hampstead Assembly, in "Evelina." In these things (in private life, at least), I pretend to some small experience; because, in the course of my youth, I have seen a little of all sorts of society, from the Christian prince and the Mussulman sultan and pacha, and the higher ranks of their countries, down to the London boxer, the "flash and the swell," the Spanish muleteer, the wandering Turkish dervisc, the Scotch highlander, and the Albanian robber,—to say nothing of the curious varieties of Italian social life. Par be it from me to presume that there ever was, or can be such a thing as an aristocracy of poets; but there is a nobility of thought and of style, open to all stations, and derived partly from talent, and partly from education,—which is to be found in Shakespeare, and Pope, and Burns, no less than in Dante and Alfieri, but which is nowhere to be perceived in the mock birds and bards of Mr. Hunt's little chorus. If we were asked to define what this gentlemanliness is, I should say that it is only to be defined by examples,—of those who have it, and those who have it not. In life, I should say that most military men have it, and few novel,—that several men of rank have it, and few lawyers;—that it is more frequent among authors than divines (when they are not pedants); that fencing masters have more of it than dancing-masters, and singers than players; and that (if it be not an Irishism to say so) it is far more generally diffused among women than among men. In poetry, as well as writing in general, it will never make entirely a poet or a poem; but neither poet nor poem will ever be good for any thing without it. It is the salt of society, and the seasoning of composition. Vulgarity is far worse than downright blackguardism; for the latter comprehends wit, humor, and strong sense at times; while the former is a sad abortive attempt at all things, "signifying nothing." It does not depend upon low themes, or even low language, for Fielding reveals in both,—but is he ever vulgar? No. You see the man of education, the gentleman, and the scholar, sporting with his subject,—its master, not its slave. Your vulgar writer is always most vulgar, the higher, his subject; as the man who showed the menagerie at Piccadilly was wont to say,—"This, gentlemen, is the eagle of the sun, from Archangel, in Russia; the otter it is, the sopher he flies." But to the proofs. It is a thing to be felt more than explained. Let any man take up a volume of Mr. Hunt's subordinate writers, read (if possible) a couple of pages, and pronounce for himself, if they contain not the kind of writing which may be likened to "shabby-genteel" in actual life. When he has done this, let him take up Pope,—and when he has laid him down, take up the cockney again—if he can.

NOTE.

[Note referring to some remarks of Mr. Bowles, relative to Pope's upon Lady Mary W. Montague.] I think that I could show, if necessary, that Lady Mary W. Montague was also greatly to blame in that quarrel, not for having rejected, but for having encouraged him: but I would rather decline the task—though she should have remembered her own line, "He comes too near, that comes to be denied." I admire her so much—her beauty, her talents—that I should do this reluctantly. I, besides, am so attached to the very name of Mary, that, as Johnson once said, "If you called a dog Hervey, I should love him," so, if you were to call a female of the same species "Mary," I should love it better than others (biped or quadruped) of the same sex with a different appellation. She was an extraordinary woman; she could translate Epictetus, and yet write song worthy of Aristippus. The lines,

May every fond pleasure that moments endear
Be to thee, dear lady, both delicious and rare!
Forgetting or scorning the airs of the crowd,
He may same to formal, and I be proud,
Till, &c., &c.

There, Mr. Bowles!—what say you to such a supper with such a woman? and her own description too? Is not her "champagne and chicken" worth a forest or two? Is it not poetry? It appears to me that this stanza contains the "pure" of the whole philosophy of Epicurus:—I mean the practical philosophy of his school, not the precepts of the master; for I have been too long at the university not to know that the philosopher was himself a moderate man. But, after all, would not some of us have been as great fools as Pope? For my part, I wonder that, with his quick feelings, her coquetry, and his disappointment, he did no more,—instead of writing some lines, which are to be condemned if false, and regretted if true.
SOME OBSERVATIONS
UPON AN ARTICLE IN BLACKWOOD’S MAGAZINE,
No. XXIX., AUGUST, 1819

"Why, how now, Hector! you look angry."
Macbeth.

TO J. D'ISRAELI, ESQ.,

FIF AMIABLE AND INGENIOUS AUTHOR OF "THE CALAMITIES" AND "QUARRELS OF AUTHORS;"
THIS ADDITIONAL QUARREL AND CALAMITY IS INSCRIBED BY ONE OF THE NUMBER.

Ravena, March 15, 1819.

"The life of a writer" has been said, by Pope, I believe, to be "a warfare upon earth." As far as my own experience has gone, I have nothing to say against the proposition; and, like the rest, having once plunged into this state of hostility, must, however reluctantly, carry it on. An article has appeared in a periodical work, entitled "Remarks on Don Juan," which has been so full of this spirit on the part of the writer, as to require some observations on mine.

In the first place, I am not aware by what right the writer assumes this work, which is anonymous, to be my production. He will answer, that there is internal evidence; that is to say, that there are passages which appear to be written in my name, or in my manner. But might not this have been done on purpose by another? He will say, why not then deny it? To this I could answer, that of all the things attributed to me within the last five years,—Pilgrimages to Jerusalem, Deaths upon Pale Horses, Odes to the Land of the Gaul, Adieux to England, Songs to Madame La Valette, Odes to St. Helena, Vampires, and what not,—of which, God knows, I never composed nor read a syllable beyond their titles in advertisements,—I never thought it worth while to disavow any, except one which came linked with an account of my "residence in the isle of Mitylene," where I never resided, and appeared to be carrying the amusement of those persons, who think my name can be of any use to them, a little too far.

I should hardly, therefore, if I did not take the trouble to disavow these things published in my name, and yet not mine, go out of my way to deny an anonymous work; which might appear an act of supererogation. With regard to Don Juan, I neither deny nor admit it to be mine—every body may form their own opinion; but, if there be any who now, or in the progress of that poem, if it is to be continued, feel, or should feel themselves so aggrieved as to require a more explicit answer, privately and personally they shall have it.

I have never shrunk from the responsibility of what I have written, and have more than once incurred obloquy by neglecting to disavow what was attributed to my pen without foundation.

The greater part, however, of the "Remarks on Don Juan," contain but little on the work itself, which receives an extraordinary portion of praise as a composition. With the exception of some quotations, and a few incidental remarks, the rest of the article is neither more nor less than a personal attack upon the imputed author. It is not the first in the same publication: for I recollect to have read, some time ago, similar remarks upon "Beppo" (said to have been written by a celebrated northern preacher), in which the conclusion drawn was, that "Childe Harold, Byron, and the Count in Beppo, were one and the same person;" thereby making me turn out to be, as Mrs. Malaprop says, "like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once." That article was signed "Presbyter Anglicanus:" which, I presume, being interpreted, means Scotch Presbyterian. I must here observe,—and it is at once ludicrous and vexatious to be compelled so frequently to repeat the same thing,—that my case, as an author, is peculiarly hard, in being everlastingly taken, or mistaken for my own protagonist. It is unjust and particular. I never heard that my friend Moore was set down for a fire-worshipper on account of his Guebre; that Scott was identified with Godrick Dhu, or with Balfour of Burley; or that, notwithstanding all the magicians in Thalaba, any body has ever taken Mr. Southey for a conjuror; whereas I have had some difficulty in extricating me even from Manfred, who, as Mr. Southey boldly observes in one of his articles in the Quarterly, "met the devil on the Jungfrau, and bullied him;" and I answer Mr. Southey, who has apparently, in his poetical life, not been so successful against the great enemy, that, in this, Manfred exactly followed the sacred precept,—"Resist the devil, and he will fly from you."—"I shall have more to say on the subject of this person—not the devil, but his most humble servant Mr. Southey—before I conclude.
but for the present, I must return to the article in the Edinburgh Magazine.

In the course of this article, amidst some extraordinary observations, there occur the following words:—‘It appears, in short, as if this miserable man, having exhausted every species of sensual gratification, was reduced to the most disgusting and bitterest dregs, were resolved to show us that he is no longer a human being even in his frailties,—but a cold, unconcerned fiend, laughing with aデザイン that betrays over the whole the worse elements of which human life is composed.’

In another place there appears, ‘the lurking-place of his selfish and polluted exile.’—‘By my truth, these be bitter words!’—With regard to the first sentence, it is much less indifferently as I would have spoken from Suetonius, or from any of the private memoirs of the regency, conceiving it to be amply refuted by the terms in which it is expressed, and to be utterly inapplicable to any private individual. On the words, ‘lurking-place from me, and I thought that word decent or something more to say,—How far the capital city of a government, which survived the vicissitudes of thirteen hundred years, and might still have existed but for the inane and the unequal of his imitators,—a city which was the empire of Europe, when London and Edinburgh were dens of barbarians,—may be termed a ‘lurking-place,’ I leave to those who have seen or heard of Venice, to decide. For my own part, I may have been ‘polluted,’ it is not for me to say, because the word is a wide one, and, with some of its branches, may chance to overshadow the actions of most men; but that I have been ‘selfish.’ To have done such things I do not deem much: but it is hard indeed to be compelled to recapitulate them in my own defence, by such accusations as that before me, like a panel before a jury calling testimonies to his character, or a herald at the door of an infantor, to charge the person who has made the charge of ‘selfishness’ wishes to inform himself further on the subject, he may acquire, not what he would wish to know, but what will alwayse and shame him, by applying to the Consul-General of our nation, resident in the place, who will be in the case either to confirm or deny what I have asserted.

I neither make nor have ever made, pretensions to sanctity of demeanor, nor regularity of conduct; but my means have been expended principally on my own gratification, neither now nor heretofore, neither in England nor out of it; and it wants but a fact, which is known, to prove it. It was necessary, to call forth the most willing witnesses, and at once witnesses and proofs, in England itself, to show that there are those who have derived, not the least好处 from the selfish and sinless, the means which led them to immediate happiness and ultimate independence, by my want of that very ‘selfishness,’ as grossly and falsely now imputed to my conduct.

Had I seen a selfish man,—had I been, in the worldly sense of the word, even a prudent man,—I should not be where I am:—I should not have taken the step which was then in our power; and I should have sunk as many thousands,—so to speak, of a gulph between me and mine; but in this respect the truth will one day be made known: in the mean time, as Durandarte says, in the Cave of Montesinos, ‘Patience, and shuffle the cards.’

I bitterly feel the ostentation of this statement, the first of the kind I have ever made: I feel the degradation of being compelled to make it; but I also feel its truth, and I trust to feel it on my death bed, should the whole history of my selfishness be made public. I find my selfishness, quite as the less sensible of the egotism of all this; but, alas! who have made me thus egotistical in my own defence, if not they, who, by perversely persisting in referring fiction to truth, and tracing poetry to life, and regarding characters of imagination as creatures of existence, have made me personally responsible for almost every poetical delineation which fancy and a particular bias of thought, may have tended to produce?

The writer continues:—‘Those who are acquainted, as who is not? with the main incidents of the private life of Lord B., &c. Assuredly, whoever may be acquainted with these “main incidents,” the writer of the “Remarks on Don Juan” is not, or he would use a very different language. That which I believe he alludes to as a “main incident,” happened to be a very subordinate one, and is but the name of the nation of a conspiracy, or an account of events and circumstances long prior to the period at which it occurred. It is the last drop which makes the cup run over, and mine was already full.

But, to return to Don Juan, Lord B. of “an elaborate satire on the character and manners of his wife.” From what parts of Don Juan the writer has inferred this, he himself best knows. As far as I recollect of the female characters in that production, there is but one who is depicted in ridiculous colors, or that could be interpreted as a satire upon any body. But here my poetical sins are again visited upon me, supposing that it was there that the mountain was sung over, the misanthrope, a libertine, a chief of insurgents, or an infidel, he is set down to the author; and if, in a poem by no means ascertained to be my production, there appears a disagreeable, casuistical, and by no means respectable female parent, it is set down for my wife. Is there any resemblance? If there be, it is in those who make it. I can see none. In my writings I have rarely described any character under a fictitious name: those of whom I have spoken have had their own,—in many cases a stronger satire in itself than any which could be appended to it. But of real circumstances I have availed myself plentifully, both in the serious and the ludicrous—why should I say both? as they are quite indistinguishable in this instance; but my figures are not portraits. It may have happened, that I have seized on some events that have occurred under my own observation, or in my own family, as I would paint a view from my own eyes, did it harmonize with my picture; but I never would introduce the likenesses of its living members, unless their features could be made as favorable to themselves as to the effect; which, in the above instance, would be extremely difficult.

My learned brother proceeds to observe, that “it is in vain for Lord B. to attempt in any way to justify his own behavior in that affair, and now that he has so openly and audaciously invited in inquiry and reproach, we do not see any good reason, why he should not be clearly told so by the voice of his countrymen. How far the ‘openness of an apology,’” he says, “cannot be concealed from an ignominious character, which the writer supposes to be meant for Lady B., may be deemed to merit this formidable denunciation from their ‘most sweet and eloquent voices,’” he knows nor cares; he cannot “in any way justify my own behavior in that affair,” I acquiesce, because no man can “justify” himself until he knows of what he is accused; and I have never had— and, God knows, I have had every hope to obtain—any specific charge, in a tangible shape, submitted to me by the adversary, nor by others, unless the atrocities of public rumor and the mysterious silence the lady's legal advisers may be deemed such. But is not the writer content with what has been already said and done? Has not "the general voice of his countrymen" long ago pronounced upon the subject a sentence without trial, and condemnation without intervention, as a clergyman and a political exile? ostracism, except that the shells which proscribed me were anonymous? Is the writer ignorant of the public opinion and the public conduct upon that occasion? If he is, I shall be inclined to believe this will not be long before I shall cease to remember either.

The man who is exiled by a faction has the conclusion of thinking that he is a martyr; he is unjustly and wantonly deprived of the dignity of his cause, real or imaginary: he who withdraws from the pressure of rue may indulge in the thought that time and chance will retrieve his circumstances: he who is condemned by the law, has a term to his banishment, or a dream of its abbreviation; or, it may be, the knowledge or the belief of some injustice of the law, or of its administration in his own particular, but he who is outlawed by general opinion, without the pressure of law, without belief in judging in the dark, or embarrassed circumstances, whether he be innocent or guilty, must undergo all the bitterness of exile, without hope, without pride, without alleviation. And a man whose appeal to the public founded their opinion, I am not aware; but it was general, and it was decisive. Of me or of mine they knew little, except that I had written what is called poetry, was a nobleman, had married, became a father, and was involved in differences with my wife and her relatives, no one knew why, because the persons complaining refused to state their grievances. The fashionable world was divided in every monarchical vice by public rumor and privateity: the reasonable world was naturally on the stronger side, which happened to be the lady's, as was most proper and polite. The press was active and sordid; and such was the rage of the day, that the unfortunate publication of two copies of verses, rather complimentary than otherwise to the subjects of both, was tortured into a species of crime, or constructive petty treason. I was accused of every monstrous vice by public rumor and privateity: my name, which had been a knightly or a noble one since my fathers helped to conquer the kingdom for William the Norman, was tainted. I felt that, if what was whispered, and muttered, and murmured, was true, and if the prepossessions of this country, or this England were false, England was unfit for me. I withdrew: but this was not enough. In other countries, in Switzerland, in the shadow of the Alps, and by the blue depths of the lakes, I was pursued and breathed upon by the same blight. I crossed the mountains, but it was the same; so I went a little farther, and settled myself by the waves of the Adriatic, like the stag at bay, who betakes him to the waters.

If I may judge by the statements of the few friends who gathered round me, the outcry of the periody to which I allude was beyond all precedent, all parallel, even in those cases where political motives have sharpened on the point and doubled on the edge, and I advised not to go to the theatres, lest I should be hissed, nor to my duty in parliament, lest I should be insulted by the way; even on the day of my departure, my most intimate friend told me afterwards, that he was under apprehensions of violence from the people who might be assembled at the door of the carriage. However, I was not deterred by these counsels from seeing Kean in his heroic part, and in the dress and acting of a great man. I paid my respects to the players, and to the impresario, and I parted with the French actors with a great degree of extreme satisfaction. I understand, however, that having been much hurt by Romilly's conduct, (he, having a general retainer for me, had acted as adviser to the adversary, alleging, on being reminded of his retainer, that he had forgotten it, as his clerk had so many,) I observed that some of those who were new: I never thought that there was one—but it was not of my formation, nor did I then know of its existence—none in literature; and in politics I had voted with the whigs, with precise satisfaction that that important vote possessed in these Tory days, and with such personal acquaintance with the leaders in both houses as the society in which I lived sanctioned, but without claim or expectation of any thing like friendship from any one, except a few young men of my own age and standing, and a few others more advanced in life, which last it had been my fortune to serve in cir cumstances of difficulty. This was, in fact, to stand alone; and I recollect, some time after, Madame de Staël said to me in Switzerland, "You should not have warred with the world—it will not do—it is too strong always for any individual: I myself once tried it in early life, but it will not do." I perfectly understood her, and I have always been of the same opinion. I have been on the right side of the world had done me the honor to begin the war; and, assuredly, if peace is only to be obtained by court ing and paying tribute to it, I am not qualified to obtain its countenance. I thought, in the words of Campbell, her own feelings; for whatever her reason may have been (and she never abducted them to my least), she probably neither contemplated nor conceived to what she became the means of conducting the father of her child, and the husband of her choice.

So much for "the general voice of his countrymen:" I will now speak of some in particular.

In the beginning of the year 1817, an article appeared in the Quarterly Review, written, I believe, by a great friend of his, and the companion of his banquets, and who disgraced to me, though both poetically and personally more than sufficiently favorable to the work and the author of whom it treated. It was written at a time when a selfish man would not, and a timid one dared not, call to account either of either. It was written by one to whom temporary public opinion had elevated me to the rank of a rival—a proud distinction, and solemnized; but which has not prevented me from feeling as a friend, nor him from more than corresponding to that sentiment.

The article in question was written upon the third canto of Childe Harold; and after many observations, which I could not but feel inclined to forget, concluded with "a hope that I might yet return to England." How this expression was received in England itself I am not acquainted, but it gave great offence at Rome to the respectable ten or twelve English travelers then assembled. I did not visit Rome till some time after, so that I had no opportunity of knowing the fact; but I was informed, long afterwards, that the greatest indignation had been manifested in the enlightened Ango-circle of that year, which happened to comprise within it—amidst a considerable leaven of Welbeck street and Devonshire Place, broken loose upon their travels—several really well-born, well-bred, and sensible people, not the least participate in the feeling of the hour. "Why should he return to England?" was the general exclamation—"I answer why? It is a question I have occasionally asked myself, and I never yet could give it a satisfactory reply. I had then no thoughts of returning, and if I have any now, they are of business, and not of pleasure. Amidst the ties that have been dashed to pieces, there are links yet entire, though the chain itself be broken. There are duties, and connections, which may one day require my presence—and I am a father. I have still some friends whom I wish to meet again, and it may be; The thing is one of those minute and tender details of business, which time accumulates during absence, in every man's affairs and property, may, and probably will, recall me to England; but I shall return with the same feelings with which I left it, in respect to myself, though altered with regard to individuals, as I have been more or less informed of their conduct since my departure; for it was only a considerable time after it that I was made acquainted with the real facts and full extent of some of their proceedings and language. My friends, like other friends, from conciliatory motives, withheld from me much that they could, and some things which they did not think fit to unfold; however, even the thing which was deferred is not lost—but it has been no fault of mine that it has been deferred at all.

I have alluded to what is said to have passed at Bologna; I only show that this sentiment which has described was not confined to the English in England, and as forming part of my answer to the reproach cast upon what has been called my "selfish exaltation," the great name of Mary, it has been; for who would dwell among a people entertaining strong hostility against him? How far it has been "selfish" has been already explained.

I have now arrived at a passage describing me as having vented my spleen against the lofty-minded and virtuous men," men "whose virtues few indeed can equal;" meaning, I humbly presume, the no less virtuous triumphs of the known parts of the Poets" in their aggregate capacity, and by Southey Wordsworth, and Coleridge, when taken singly. I wish to say a word or two upon the virtues of one of those persons, public and private, for reasons which will appear.

When I left England in April, 1816, ill in mind, in body, and in circumstances, I took up my residence at Coligny, by the lake of Geneva. The sole reason, as it will appear, was the knowing some one who had to make his way in the world, and having seen very little of it, was naturally and laboriously desirous of seeing more society than suited my present habits or my past experience. I therefore presented him to those gentlemen of Geneva for whom I had letters of introduction; and having thus seen him in a situation to make his own way, retired for my own part entirely from society, with the exception of one English family, living at about a quarter of a mile's distance from Diodati, and with the further exception of some occasional intercourse with Coppet, at the wish of Madame de Staël. The English family to which I allude consisted of two sisters, a gentleman and his son, a boy of a year old.

One of "these lofty-minded and virtuous men," in the words of the Edinburgh Magazine, made, I understand, a report, that the gentleman to whom I have alluded and myself were living in promiscuous intercourse with two sisters, "having formed a league of inest" (I quote the words as they were stated to me), and indulged himself on the natural comments upon such a conjunction, which are said to have been repeated publicly, with great complacency, by another of that poetical fraternity, of whom I shall say only, that even had the story been true, he should not have repeated it, so as it regarded myself, except in sorrow. The tale itself requires but a word in answer—the ladies were not sisters, nor in any degree connected, except by the second marriage of their respective parents, a widower with a widow, both being the offspring of former marriages; neither of them, in 1816, nineteen years old. "Promiscuous intercourse" could hardly have disgusted the great patron of pantisocracy, (does Mr. Southey remember such a scheme?) but there was no such thing.

How far this man, who, as author of Wat Tyler, has been proclaimed by the Lord Chancellor guilty of a treasonable and blasphemous libel, and denounced by the House of Commons, by the upright and able member for Norwich, as a "rancorous renegade," be fit for sitting as a judge upon others, let others judge. He has said that for this expression "he brands William Smith on the forehead as a calumniator," and that "Be mark without his epitaph." How long William Smith's epitaph will last, and in what words it will be written, I know not; but William Smith's words form the epitaph itself of Wat Tyler, and have written Wat Tyler, and taken the office of poet laureate—he has, in the Life of Henry Kirke White, denominated reviewing "the ungentle craft," and has become a reviewer—he was one of the projectors of a scheme, called "pantisocracy," for having all things, including women, in common, (query, common women?) and he sits up as a moralist—he denounced the battle of Blenheim, and he praised the battle of Waterloo. Wat Tyler, the Volunteer, who tried to blast the character of her daughter (one of the young females mentioned) he wrote treason, and serves the king—he was the butt of the Anti-Jacobins, he left the prop of the State, by licking the hands that smote him, eating the bread.
of his enemies, and internally writhing beneath his own contempt,—he would faint conceal, under anonymous buster, and a vain endeavor to obtain the estimation of bookseller; but ever for his own lost honor, his leprous sense of his own impurity, and am praised by my mother, from the kings who preceded those whom he has hired himself to sing. It cannot, then, be his birth. As a poet, I have, for the past eight years, been trying to apprehend from a competition; and for the future, I conclude, I am open to every poet's creed," is open to all. I will only remind Mr. Southey, in the words of a critic, who, if still living, would have annihilated Southey's literary existence now and hereafter, as the sworn foe of charlatans and impostors, from Macpherson downwards, that "those dreams were Selkirk's once and Ogilby's;" and for my own part, I assure him, that whatever he and his works are remembered, I shall be proud to be "forgot." That he is not content with his success as a poet may reasonably be believed—he has been the nuncio of reviews; the Edinburgh knocked him down, and the Quarterly et al. He has really used himself; he has crossed the pericline, and made a point of recommending his works to purchasers, so that he is occasionally bought, (I mean his book, as well as the author.) Southey has been of the same shelf, if not upon the table, of most of the gentlemen employed in the different offices. With regard to his private virtues, I know nothing—of his principles, I have heard enough. As far as having been, to the best of my power, beneficial to others, I do not find the comparison; and for the errors of the passions, was Mr. Southey always so tranquil and stainless? Did he never covet his neighbor's wife? Did he never calculate for his neighbor's wife's daughter, the offspring of her he coveted? So much for the apostle of pantocracy.

Of the "lofty-minded, virtuous" Wordsworth, one anecdote will suffice to speak his sincerity. In a conversation with Mr. — upon poetry, he concluded with, "After all, I would not give five shilling for all that Southey has ever written." Perhaps this calculation might rather show his esteem for his own value, than the value of Dr. Southey; but considering that when he was in his need, and Southey had a shilling, Wordsworth is said to have had generally a sixpence out of it, it has an awkward sound in the way of valuation. This anecdote was told me by individuals who, quoted by name, would prove that its genealogy is poetical as well as true. I can give my authority for this; and am ready to adduce it also for Mr. Southey's circulation of the falsehood before mentioned.

Of Coleridge, I shall say nothing,—why, he may divine.

I have said more of those people than I intended in this place, being somewhat stirred by the remarks which induced me to commence upon the topic. I see nothing in these men as poets, or as individuals—little in their talents, and less in their characters, to make them worth the commendation of posterity. Of the post-eminent critics, they are admirable for their considerable contempt, in prose or rhyme, as it may happen. Mr. Southey has the Quarterly for his field of rejoinder, and Mr. Wordsworth his postscript to it, as in Lyall's, where the two great instances of the sublime are taken from himself and Milton. "Over her own sweet voice the stock-dove broods;" that is to say, she has the pleasure of listening to herself, in common with Mr. Wordsworth, upon most of his public appearances. "What divinity doth hedge' these persons, that we should respect them? Is it Apollo? Are they not of those who called Dryden's Ode "a drunken song?" have discovered that Gray's Elegy is full of faults, (see Coleridge's Life, vol. i. 8s e, for Wordsworth's kind less in pointing to's out to him,) and have published what is allowed to be the very worst prose that ever was written, to prove that Pope was no poet, and that William Wordsworth, in other topics, they respectable, or respected? Is it on the open avowal of apostasy, on the patronage of government, that their claim is founded? Who is there who esteems those parriades of their own principles, and finds they mean it for the reward of their change has been any thing but honor. The times have preserved a respect for political consistency, and, even though changeable, honor the unchanged. Look long ere Southey meets with such a triumph in London as Moore met with in Dublin, even if the government subscribe for it, and set the money down to secret service. It was not less to the man than to the poet, that was not a patriot, to the not opulent but incorruptible fellow-citizen, that the warm-hearted Irish paid the proudest of tributes. Mr. Southey may applaud himself and his works, but he need not be terrified at the approach of every poet's creed."

"The Love of Triangles," the joint production of Avevant, Cattell and Penn.
Malmsey batt, and Mr. Wordsworth* became qualified to guage it, that the great revolutionary tragedy came before the public and the Court of Chancery. Wordsworth was allowed the privilege of brooding a preface, to be succeeded in due course by a postscript; both couched in such prose as must give peculiar delight to those who have read the prefaces of Pope and Dryden; scarcely less celebrated for the beauty of their prose, than for the charm of their verse. Wordsworth is the reverse of Mollière's gentleman who had been "talking prose all his life, without knowing it," for he thinks that he has "come at last to thinking both prose and verse, and neither of what he conceives to be such can be properly said to be either one or the other. Mr. Coleridge, the future sages, poet and prose, and poet and prose, (an honor also claimed by Mr. Fitzgerald, of the "Rejected Addresses") who ultimately prophesied the downfall of Bonaparte, to which he himself mainly contributed, by giving him the nickname of "the Coriolan," was then employed in predicating the damnation of Mr. Pitt, and the desolation of England, in the two very best copies of verses he ever wrote: to wit, the Infernal elegy of "Fire, Funime, and the Iliad," and the poetical one of "A Dream Yea." These three personages, Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, had all of them a very natural antipathy to Pope, and I respect them for it, as the only logical feeling or principle which they have contrived to have been joined in by those who have joined them in nothing else: by the Edinburgh Reviewers, by the whole heterogeneous mass of living English poets, excepting Crabbe, Rogers, Gifford, and Campbell, who, both by precept and practice, have proved their adherence; and by me, who have shamefully deviated in practice, but have ever loved and honored Pope with my whole soul, and hope to do so till my dying day. I would rather see all I have ever written the same trunk in which I actually read the eleventh book of a modern epic poem at Malta, in 1811, (I opened it to take out a change after the paroxysm of a tertian, in the absence of my servant, and found it lined with the name of the maker, Eyre, Cockspur street, and with the epic poetry alluded to,) than sacrifice what I firmly believe in, that the Christianity of English poetry, the poetry of Pope. But the Edinburgh Reviewers, and the Lakers, and Hunt and his school, and every body else with their school, and even Moore without a score of distinct and elderly gentlemen who translate and imitate, and young ladies who listen and repeat, baronets who draw indifferent frontispieces for bad poets, and noblemen who let them down with them in the country, the small body of the wits and the great body of the blues, have latterly united in a deprecation, of which their fathers would have been as much ashamed as their children will be. In the mean time, what have we got instead? The last school, which began with an epic poem, written in six weeks, (so Joan of Arc proclaimed herself,) and finished with a ballad composed in twenty years, as "The Smugglers," has engaged all their forces to inform the few who will inquire. What have we got instead? A deluge of flimsy and unintelligible romances, imitated from Scott and myself, who have both made the best of our bad materials and erroneous system, which we got into our heads, were neither an epic nor any thing else; Thalaba, Kehama, Gebir, and such gibberish, written in all metres and in no language. Hunt, who had power to have made "the Story of Rimini" as perfect a fable of Job, had the best genius and his taste to some unintelligible notions of Wordsworth, which I defy him to explain. Moore has — but why continue? All, with the exception of the Baroness Gaskell — who may be considered as having taken their station, will, by the blessing of God, survive their own reputation, without attaining any very extraordinary period of longevity. Of course there must be a still further decrease, and novel having never obtained any reputation at all, unless it be among provincial literati, and their own families, have none to lose; and of Moore, who, as the Burns of Ireland, possesses a fame which can not be lost.

The greater part of the poets mentioned, however, have been able to gather together a few followers. A paper of the Connoisseur says, that "it is observed by the French, that a cat, a priest, and an old woman are sufficient to constitute a religious sect in England." The same number of animals, with a difference in kind, will suffice for a similar purpose, if poetical ones, instead of the cat, having shown himself but too distinctly to be an object to which that noble creature is peculiarly hostile.

Nevertheless, I will not go so far as Wordsworth in his postscript, who pretends that "no great poet ever had immediate fame; which being interpreted, means that William Wordsworth is not quite so much read by his cotemporaries as might be desirable. This assertion is as false as it is foolish. Homer's glory is due to his present popularity: he recited,—and without the strongest impression of the moment, who would have gotten the Iliad by heart, and given it to tradition? Ennins, Terence, Plautus, Lucretius Horace, Virgil, Eschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Sappho, Anacreon, Theocritus, all the great poets of antiquity, were the delight of their cotemporaries. The very existence of a poet, previous to the invention of printing, depended upon his present popularity; and how often has it impaired his future fame? Hardly ever. History informs us that the best have come down to us. The reason is evident; the most popular found the greatest number of transcribers for their works, the most public cotemporaries was corrupt can hardly be avouched by the moderns, the mightiest of whom have but barely approached them. Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, and Tasso, were all the darlings of the cotemporary reader. Dante's poem was celebrated long before his death: and, not long after it, states negotiated for his ashes, and disputed for the sites of the composition of the Divina Commedia. Petrarch was crowned in the Capitol. Ariosto was permitted to pass free by the public robber who had read the Orlando Furioso. I would not recommend Mr. Wordsworth to try the same experiment with his Smugglers. The great discredits of the criticisms of the Crusatcni, would have been crowned in the Capitol, but for his death.

It is easy to prove the immediate popularity of the chief poets of modern nation in Europe that has a poetical language—the Italian. In our own, Shakespeare, Spencer, Johnson, Waller, Dryden, Congreve, Pope, Young, Shenstone, Thomson, Johnson, Goldsmith, Gray, were all as popular in their lives as since Gray's Elegy pleased instantly, and eternally. His Odes did not, nor yet do they please like his Elegy. Milton's politics kept him down. But the Epigram of Dryden,* and the very

* Goldsmith has anticipated the definition of the Lake poetry, as far as change of name is concerned. He calls it the "Lakers," from the lake which they all Moralized to the Exe, and the usual see his pedlar? It will have answered perfectly for that purpose, but a uno unfortunately not written in good English.
OBSERVATIONS UPON AN ARTICLE IN BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

In Blackwood's Magazine, by Mr. Hoole, the author of "Poetry," and "The Character of Pope," the following is printed.

"I have understood, that the late Mr. Horace Walpole was greater in the first four years after its publication, than that of "The Excursion." If you search for passion, where is it to be found stronger than in the epistle from Eloisa to Abelard, or in Palamon and Arcite? Do not, then, say, "I will for my imagination, subtlety, character? seek them in the Rape of the Lock, the Fables of Dryden, the Ode of Saint Cecilia's Day, and Absalom and Achitophel; you will discover in those two poems, all for which you must range up innumerable, and God only knows how many writers of the day, without finding a tittle of the same qualities,—with the addition, too, of wit, of which the latter have none. I have endeavored to vindicate the names of Brown the Younger, the Fudge Family, or Whistler's; but that is not wit—it is humor. I will say nothing of the harmony of Pope and Dryden in comparison, for there is not a living poet (except Rogers, Giffford, Campbell, and Crabbe), who can write an heroic couplet. The fact is, that the exquisite beauty of their versification has withdrawn the public attention from their other excellences, as the vulgar eye will rest more upon the splendor of the uniform than the quality of the troops. It is this very harmony, particularly in Pope, which has raised the vulgar and atrocious cant against him;—because his versification is perfect, it is his only perfection: because his truths are so clear, it is asserted that he has no invention; and because he is always intelligible, it is taken for granted that he has no genius. We are sneeringly told that he is the 'authoritative writer, without reason, who has a reason for his being no poet.'

Taking passage for passage, I will undertake to cite more lines teeming with imagination from Pope than from any two living poets, be they who they may. To take an instance at random from a species of composition not very favorable to imagination—Satire: set down the character of Sporus, with all the wonderful play of fancy which is scattered over it, and you see by its side an example of two existing poets, of the same power, and the same variety—where will you find them?

I merely mention one instance of many in reply to the injustice done to the memory of him who harmonized our poetical language. The attorneys' clerks, and other self-educated geni, found it easier to distort themselves to the new models, than to tell after the symmetry of him who had enchanted the world by being told that the new school were to revive the language of Queen Elizabeth, the true English: as every body in the reign of Queen Anne wrote no better than French, by a species of literary treason.

'* Let Sporus amble—A. What? that thing of our Sporus, that mere white coat of sam's smite?
Satire in error, since I can Sporus feel!
Who ignites a butterfly upon a wheel!
P. Yet let me flag this bug with golden wings,
This painted child of dirt, that sings and swats
Whose face is the grin and the dim comets,
You wit never taste, and beauty never supply,
So well-backed soiled and slightly scolded
In muddling of the game they dare not bite Erected under his episcopal breezy hat.
As shallow swarms run stuffing all the way.
Whatever in Your bosom he speaks,
And, in the proper measure, the popet apostate,
Or at the roar of Eve, familiar loud,
Half truths, half evens, make himself absurd
In press, in politics, or town, or sea,
Or spirit, or wit, or rhymes, or blasphemies,
His wit all see-seen between that and this,
Not with poetic law, now present, now new laws,
And he himself one vile asterisms.
Ambitious thing that must sitting ever part,
That with all that, or the corrupted heart.
For as the toats, flatterer at the board,
Now trip it lucky, and now stairs a lord.
Everywhere, and that the Holdsden has spread,
A chee's face, a rope all the rest,
 Rwanda that speaks to pure, pure nor must there,
With it can creep, and spite that likes that thing.
Proe, in oO.
BLANK VERSE, WHICH, UNLESS IN THE DRAMA, NO ONE EXCEPT MILTON EVER WROTE WHO COULD RHYME, BECAUSE THE ORDER OF THE DAY—OR ELSE SUCH RHYME AS LOOKED SO STRANGE TO THE VERSE WITHOUT A RHYME—HAS SAID HE COULD NOT "PREVAIL UPON HIMSELF TO WISH THAT MILTON HAD BEEN A RHYMER." THE OPINIONS OF THAT TRULY GREAT MAN, WHOM IT IS ALSO THE PRESENT FASHION TO DECRY, WILL EVER BE RECEIVED BY ME WITH THAT RESPECT WHICH TIME WILL RESTORE TO HIM FROM ALL, BUT WITH ALL HUMILITY, I AM NOT CONVINCED THAT THE PARADISE LOST WOULD NOT HAVE BEEN MORE NOBLY CONVEYED TO THE_public CONSCIOUS, NOT PERHAPS MORE COMPLICATED, ALTHOUGH EVEN THEY COULD SUSTAIN THE SUBJECT IF WELL BALANCED, BUT IN THE STANZA OF SPENCER OR OF TASSO, OR IN THE TERZA RIMA OF DANTE, WHICH THE POWERS OF MILTON COULD EASILY HAVE GRAVED ON OUR LANGUAGE. THE SEASONS OF THOMSON WOULD HAVE BEEN BETTER IN VERSE, ALTHOUGH STILL INFERIOR TO HIS CASTLE OF INDOLENCE; AND Mr. SOUTHEY'S JOHN OF ARC NO WORSE, ALTHOUGH IT MIGHT HAVE TAKEN SIX MONTHS INSTEAD OF WEEKS IN THE COMPOSITION. I RECOMMEND ALSO TO THE LOVERS OF LAY THE PERUSAL OF THE PRESENT LAUREATE'S ODYSSEY BY THE SIDE OF DRYDEN'S ON SAINT CEILLIA, BUT LET HIM BE SURE TO READ FIRST THOSE OF MR. SOUTHEY.

TO THE HEAVEN-BORN GENIUS AND INSPIRED YOUNG SCRIBERALS OF THE DAY MUCH OF THIS WILL APPEAR PARADOXICAL; IT WILL APPEAR SO EVEN TO THE HIGHER ORDER OF OUR CRITICS; BUT IT WAS TRULY TWENTY YEARS AGO, AND IT WILL BE RECEIVED IN THE NEW TRUTH OF TEN YEARS. IN THE MEAN TIME, I WILL CONCLUDE WITH TWO QUOTATIONS, WHICH INTENDED FOR SOME OF MY OLD CLASSICAL FRIENDS WHO HAVE STILL ENOUGH OF CUMBRIAN ABOUT THEM TO THINK THEMSELVES INSPIRED BY HAVING HAD JOHN DRYDEN AS A PREDECESSOR IN THEIR COLLEGE, AND TO RECOLLECT THAT THEIR EARLIEST ENGLISH POETICAL PLEASURES WERE DRAWN FROM THE "LITTLE NIGHTINGALE" OF TWICKENHAM. THE FIRST IS FROM THE NOTES TO THE POEM OF THE "SPOONFUL." THE SECOND IS FROM THE VOLUME OF A YOUNG PERSON LEARNING TO WRITE POETRY, AND BEGINNING BY TEACHING THE ART. HEAR HIM: •

"BUT YE WERE DEAD
To things ye knew not of—were clearly dead
To mean laws lived out with wonted rule
And compass wise; so that ye taught a school,
Of dole to smooth, i.e., to, and ship, and she, and she,
Yet, oye the certain wand of Jenucia's wife,
Their verse alluded. Essay was the task:
A thousand habitations were the mask
Of poesy, Halian, impious race,
That disdained the bright lyric to his face,

1. Written by Lord Byron's early friend, the Rev. Francis Hodgson.
2. In a manuscript note on this passage of the pamphlet, dated Nov. 15, 1817, Lord Byron says—"Mr. Keats died at the age of 18, a year after this was written, of a disease proximately caused by his having burnt a thistle-vessel in reading the article on his 'Endymion' in the Quarterly Review. I have read the article before and since; and although it is bitter, I do not think that man should be permitted to be killed by a young man's dreams. He must inevitably die as the cause of a life amusement of public notice. My indignation at Mr. Keats's depreciation of Pope has usually prevented me to do justice to his own genius, which, most marvelously fantastic Hyperion of his style, was ungodly of great promise. His fragment of 'Hyperion' seems actually inspired by the Thane, and is so sublime as to be sublime in its own genus, which, most marvelously fantastic Hyperion of his style, was ungodly of great promise.

3. A thousand similar passages crowd upon me, all compiled by Pope unless his two and two-thirds in verse is in question, then he is not a poet, and no poet. He is told so in such lines as—"I beg the reader to compare these youthful verses of the "no poet." Most we repeat the question of Johnson. If Pope is not a poet, where is poetry to be found? Even in desperted poetry, the lowest department of the art, he will be found, on a fair examination, to surprise any living writer.
ominous title,) from whence the above canons are taken. Pope's was written at nineteen, and published at twenty-two.

Such are the triumphs of the new schools, and such their scholars. The disciples of Pope were Johnson, Goldsmith, Rogers, Campbell, Crabbe, Gifford, Matthias, Hales, and the author of the Paradise of Coquettes; to whom may be added Richards, Heber, Wrangham, Bland, Hodgeson, Merivale, and others who have not had their full fame, because "the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," and because there is a fortune in fame as in all other things. Now, of all the new schools—I say all, for, "like Legion, they are many"—has there appeared a single scholar who has not made his master ashamed of him? unless it be Sotheby, who has imitated every body, and occasionally surpassed his models. Scott found peculiar favor and imitation among the fair sex: there was Miss Holford, and Miss Mitford, and Miss Francis; but, with the greatest respect be it spoken, none of his imitators did much honor to the original, except Hogg, the Ettrick shepherd, until the appearance of "The Bridal of Triermain," and "Harold the Dauntless," which in the opinion of some equalled if not surpassed him; and lo! after three or four years they turned out to be the Master's own compositions. Have Southey, or Coleridge, or T'other fellow, made a follower of renown? Wilson never did well till he set up for himself in the "City of the Plague." Has Moore, or any other living writer of reputation, had a tolerable imitator, or rather disciple? Now, it is remarkable, that almost all the followers of Pope, whom I have named, have produced beautiful and standard works, and it was not the number of his imitators who finally hurt his fame, but the despair of imitation, and the case of not imitating him sufficiently. This, and the same reason which induced the Athenian burgher to vote for the banishment of Aristides, "because he was tired of always hearing him called the Just," have produced the temporary exile of Pope from the State of Literature. But the term of his ostracism will expire, and the sooner the better, not for him, but for those who banished him, and for the coming generation, who "Will blush to find their fathers were his foes."

I will now return to the writer of the article which has drawn forth these remarks, whom I honestly take to be John Wilson, a man of great powers and acquirements, well known to the public as the author of the "City of the Plague," "Isle of Palms," and other productions. I take the liberty of naming him, by the same species of courtesy which has induced him to designate me as the author of Don Juan. Upon the score of the Lake Poets, he may perhaps recall to mind that I merely express an opinion long ago entertained and specified in a letter to Mr. James Hogg, which he the said James Hogg, somewhat contrary to the law of copyists, showed to Mr. John Wilson, in the year 1814, as he himself informed me in his answer, telling me by way of apology, that "he'd be d— if he could help it;" and I am not conscious of any thing like "envy" or "exacerbation" at this moment which induces me to think better or worse of Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge as poets than I do now, although I do know one or two things more which have added to my contempt for them as individuals. And, in return for Mr. Wilson's invective, I shall content myself with asking one question: Did he never compose, recite, or sing any parody or parodies upon the Psalms (of what nature this deponent with not), in certain joyful meetings of the youth of Edinburgh? It is not that I think any great harm if he did; because it seems to me that all depends upon the intention of such a parody. If it be meant to throw ridicule on the sacred original, it is a sin; if it be intended to burlesque the profane subject, or to inculcate a moral truth, it is none. If it were, the unbelievers' Creed, the many political parodies of various parts of the Scriptures and liturgy, particularly a celebrated one of the Lord's Prayer, and the beautiful moral parable in favor of toleration by Franklin, which has often been taken for a real extract from Genesis, would all be signs of a damning nature. But I wish to know, if Mr. Wilson ever has done this, and if he has, why he should be so very angry with similar portions of Don Juan—I did no "parody profane" appear in any of the earlier numbers of Blackwood's Magazine?

I will now conclude this long answer to a short article, repenting of having said so much in my own defence, and so little on the "crying, left-hand fallings off and national deflections" of the poetry of the present day. Having said this, I can hardly be expected to defend Don Juan, or any other "living" poetry, and shall not make the attempt. And although I do not think that Mr. John Wilson has in this instance treated me with candor or consideration, I trust that the tone I have used in speaking of him personally will prove that I bear him as little malice as I really believe at the bottom of his heart he bears towards me; but the duties of an editor, like those of a tax-gatherer, are paramount and peremptory. I have done.

YRON.
In the first canto of Don Juan appeared the following passage:

"For fear some prudish readers should grow sillish, I've bribed My Grandmother's Review,—the British!

I sent it in a letter to the editor, Who thanked me daily by return of post—I'm for a handsome article his creditor; Yet if my gentle Muse he please to rest, And break a promise after having made it, I'll show the receipt of what I owe, And since his page with gold instead of honey, All I can say is—that he had the money."

On the appearance of the poem, the learned editor of the Review in question allowed himself to be deceived into the ineffable absurdity of taking the charge as serious, and, in his succeeding numbers, came forth with an indignant contradiction of it: to which Lord Byron replied in the following letter:

"My Dear Roberts,

"As a believer in the Church of England—to say nothing of the State—I have been an occasional reader, and great admirer of, though not a subscriber to, your Review, which is rather expensive. But I do not know that any part of its contents ever gave me much surprise till the eleventh article of your twenty-seventh number made its appearance. You have there most vigorously refuted a calumnious accusation of bribery and corruption, the credence of which in the public mind might not only have damaged your reputation as a barrister and an editor, but, what would have been still worse, have injured the circulation of your journal; which, I regret to hear, is not so extensive as the purity (as you well observe) of its, &c., &c., and the present taste for propriety would induce us to expect. The charge itself is of a solemn nature, and, although in verse, is couched in terms of such circumstantial gravity, as to induce a belief little short of that generally accorded to the thirty-nine articles, to which you so frankly subscribed on taking your degrees. It is a charge the most revolting to the heart of man, from its frequent occurrence; to the mind of a lawyer, from its occasional truth; and to the soul of an editor, from its moral impossibility. You are charged, then, in the last line of one octave stanza, and the whole eight lines of the next, viz., two hundred and ninth and two hundred and tenth of the first canto of Dr. a pestilent poet, Don Juan, with receiving, and still more foolishly acknowledging the receipt of certain monies, to eulogize the unknown author by whom this count must be known to you, if to nobody else. An impecuniosity of this nature, so seriously made, there is but one way of refuting; and it is my firm persuasion, that whether you did or did not (and I believe that you did), you are accused of the said monies, of which I wish that he had specified the sum, you are quite right in denying a knowledge of the transaction. If charges of this nefarious description are to go forth sanctioned by all the solemnity of circumstance, and guaranteed by the veracity of verse (as Counselor Phillips would say) what is to become of readers hitherto implicitly confident in the not less veracious prose of our critical journals? What is to become of the reviews? And if the reviews fail, what is to become of the editors? It is common cause, and you have done well to sound the alarm. . . . myself, in my humble sphere, will be one of your echoes. In the words of the tragedian Liston, 'I love a row,' and you seem justly determined to make one.

"It is barely possible, certainly improbable, that the writer might have been in jest; but this only aggravates his crime. A joke, the beheader says, breaks no bones; but it may break a bookseller, or it may be the cause of bones being broken. The jest is but a bad one at the best for the author, and might have been a still worse one for you, if your copious contradiction did not certify to all whom it may concern your own indignant innocence, and the immaculate purity of the British Review. I do not doubt your word, my dear Roberts, yet I cannot help wishing that in a case of such vital importance, it had assumed the more substantial shape of an affidavit sworn before the Lord Mayor.

"I am sure, my dear Roberts, that you will take these observations of mine in good part; they are written in a spirit of friendship not less pure than your own editorial integrity. I have always admired you; and not knowing any shape which friendship and admiration can assume more agreeable and useful than that of good advice, I shall continue my benevolences, mixed with here and there a monitory hint as to what I conceive to be the line you should pursue, in case you should ever again be assailed with bribes, or accused of taking them. By-the-way, you don't say much about the poem, except that it is 'flagitious.' This is a pity—you should have cut it up; because, to say the truth, it not doing so, you somewhat assist any notions which the malignant might entertain on the score of the anonymous asseveration which has made you so angry.

"You say, no bookseller 'was willing to take upon himself the publication, though many of them disgrace themselves by selling it.' Now, my dear friend, though we all know that those fellows will do any thing for money, methinks the disgrace is more with the purchaser; and when such, double less, there are, for there can be no very extensive selling (as you will perceive by that of the British Review) without buying. You then add, 'what can the critic say?' I am sure I don't know; at present liberty to make the book fit for the purpose. Then comes, 'for praise, as far as regards the poetry, many passages might be exhibited; for condemnation, as far as regards the morality, all.' Nor do I suppose that you and I made any reputation; my heart bleeds for both; and I ask you, whether or not such language does not come positively under the description of 'the puff collious,' for which see Sheridan's face of 'The Critic,' (by-the-by, a little more facetious than your face under the same title) towards the close of scene second, act the first.

TO THE EDITOR OF MY GRANDMOTHER'S REVIEW,

LETTER TO THE EDITOR OF MY GRANDMOTHER'S REVIEW

'The poem, it seems, sold as the work of Lord Byron; but you feel yourself 'at liberty to suppose it not Lord B.'s composition.' Why did you ever suppose that it was? I approve of your indignation—I applaud it—I feel as angry as you can; but perhaps your virtuous wrath carries you a little too far, which made me think that 'no man is an island, nor even that of sending into the world obscene and blasphemous poetry, the product of studious lewdness and labored impetu, appears to you so detestable as it would be to any man by the exercise of a review, as the condition of praising an author.' The devil it doesn't! Think a little. This is being critical overmuch. In point of Gentile benevolence or Christian charity, it were surely less criminal to praise for a bribe, than to abuse a fellow-creature for nothing; and as to the assertion of the comparative innocence of blasphemy and obscenity, confronted with an editor's 'acceptance of a present,' I think you must admit it is not a very good point, very well, but as a Christian barrister, I would not recommend you to transplant this sentence into a brief.

And yet you say, 'the miserable man, (for miserable he is, as having a soul of which he cannot get rid.)' But here I must pause, and inquire what is the meaning of this parenthesis. We have heard of people of 'little soul,' or of 'no soul at all,' but never till now of the misery of having a soul of which we cannot get rid; a misery under which you are possibly no great sufferer, having got rid apparently of some of the intellectual part of your own, when you penned this pretty piece of eloquence.

You call, 'That you call Lord Byron, always supposing him not the author, to disdain 'with all gentlemanly haste,' &c, &c. I am told that Lord B. is in a foreign country, some thousand miles off it may be; so that it will be difficult for him to hurry to your wishes. In the mean time, perhaps you yourself have set an example of more haste than gentility; but 'the more haste the worse speed.'

Let us now look at the charge itself, my dear Roberts, which appears to me to be in some degree not quite explicitly worded:

"I blamed my Grandmother's Review, the British."

I recollect hearing, soon after the publication, this subject discussed at the tea-table of Mr. S. the poet, who expressed himself, I remember, a good deal of it. He was of opinion that Byron had not composed the poem, nor any of his six tragedies, of which, in one instance, the bad taste of the pit, and in all the rest, the barbarous repugnance of the principal and inexpressive performance. Mrs. and Mr. Misses S., being in a corner of the room, I had the proof sheets of some new poems on Italy. (I wish, by-the-by, Mrs. S. would make the tea a little stronger, the male part of the conversazioni were so talkative.) I made a few observations on the poem and passage in question, and there was a difference of opinion. Some thought the allusion was to the British Critic; others, that by the expression, 'my Grandmother's Review,' it was intimated that I was not a reader of the review, but actually the writer; whereby insinuating, my dear Roberts, that you were an old woman; because, as people often say, 'Jeffrey's Review,' 'Gofford's Review,' in lieu of Edinburgh a Quarterly; so 'my Grandmother's Review' be also synonymous. Now, whatever color his insinuation might derive from the circumstance of your wearing a gown, as well as from your time of life, your old age, your plain dress, and your writings, I will take upon myself to exculpate you from all suspicion of the kind, and assert, without calling Mrs. Roberts in testimony, that if ever you should be chosen Pope, you will pass through all the previous ceremonies with as much credit as any pontiff since the parturition of Joan. It is very unfair to judge of sex from writings, particularly from those of the British Review. We are all liable to be deceived; and it is an indubitable fact, that many of the best articles in your journal, which were attributed to a veteran female, were actually written by you yourself; and yet to this day there are people who have never found out the difference. But let us return to the main subject at hand.

'I agree with you that it is impossible Lord Byron should be the author, not only because as a British peer and a British poet, it would be impracticable for him to write it; but for some other reasons which you have omitted to state. In the first place, his lordship has no grandmother. Now the author—and we may believe his in this—doth express in that the "British" is his 'Grandmother's Review' and if, as I think I have distinctly proved, this was not a mere figurative allusion to your supposed intellectual age and sex, my dear friend, it follows, whether you be she or he, that Lord Byron is still extant. And I can the more readily credit this having a sexagenary am of your own, who perused you constantly, till unfortunately falling asleep over the leading article of your last number, her spectacles fell off and were broken against the fender, after a faithful service of fifteen years, and she has never been able to fit her eyes since; so that I have been forced to read you aloud to her; and this is in fact the reason why I became acquainted with the subject of my present letter, and thus determined to become your public correspondent.

In the next place, Lord B.'s destiny seems in some sort connected with that of Hercules, and became the author of all unappropriated profiliogies.

B. has been supposed the author of the 'Vampire,' of a 'Pilgrimage to Jerusalem,' 'To the Dead Sea,' of 'Death upon the Pale Horse,' of odes to 'Lavolette,' to 'Saint Helena,' to the Lord of the Goul, and to a sucking child. Now he turned out to have written none of these things. Besides, you say, he knows in what a spirit of, &c, &c. criticise. Are you sure he knows all this? that he has read you like your poor dear aunt? They tell me he is a queer sort of a man; and I would not be too sure, if I were you, either of what he has read or what he has written. I thought his style had been the serious and terror, for thro' as much as he would for the first time that ever I heard of his paying his reviewers in that coin; I thought that it was rather in their own, to judge from some of his earlier productions. He has praised his name, the present, and given his professor, in his expenditure, I should conjecture that his reviewer's bill is not so long as his tailor's.

'If shall I give you what I think a prudent opinion? I don't mean to insinuate, God forbid! but if, by any addendum, one could persuade him that it is the correspondence between you and the unknown author, whoever he may be, send him back his money: I dare say he will be very glad to have it again: it can't be much, considering the value of the article and the circulation of the journal; and you are too modest to rate your praise beyond its real worth —

Don't be angry,—I know you won't,—at this appraisement of your powers of eulogy; for on the other hand, my dear friend, depend upon it your abuse is worth, not its own weight—that's a farther,—but your weight in gold. So don't spare it: if he has bargained for that, give it handsomely, and depend upon your doing him a friendly office.

"But I only speak in case of possibility; for, as I said before, I cannot believe in the first instance, that you would receive a bribe to praise any person whatever; and still less can I believe that your praise could ever produce such an offer. You are a good creature, my dear Roberts, and a clever fellow; else I could almost suspect that you had fallen into the very trap set for you in verse by this anonymous wag, who will certainly be too happy to see you bearing the trouble of making you ridiculous. The fact is, that the solemnity of your eleventh article does make you look a little more absurd than you ever yet looked, in all probability, and at the same time does no good; for if any body believed before in the octave stanzas, they will believe still, and you will find it not less difficult to prove your negative, than the learned Partridge found it to demonstrate his not being dead, to the satisfaction of the readers of almanacs."

"What the motives of this writer may have been for (as you magnificently translate his quizzing you) 'sitting, with the particularity which belongs to fact, the forgery of a groundless fiction,' (do pray, my dear R., talk a little less 'in King Canutes' vein,) I cannot pretend to say; perhaps to laugh at you, but this is no reason for your benevolently making all the world laugh also. I approve of your being angry; I tell you I am angry too; but you should not have shown it so outrageously. Your solemn 'if somebody personating the Editor of the,' &c., &c., 'has received from Lord B., or from any other person,' reminds me of Charley Incledon's usual exordium when people came into the tavern to hear him sing without paying their share of the reckoning—'If a maun, or any maun, or any other maun,' &c., &c.; you have both the same redundant eloquence. But why should you think any body would persuade you? Nobody would dream of such a prank who ever read your compositions and perhaps not many who have heard your conversation. But I have been inoculated with a little of your proximity. The fact is, my dear Roberts, that somebody has tried to make a fool of you, and what he did not succeed in doing, you have done for him and for yourself."

"With regard to the poem itself, or the author, whom I cannot find out, (can you?) I have nothing to say; my business is with you. I am sure that you will, upon second thoughts, be really obliged to me for the intention of this letter, however far short my expressions may have fallen of the sincere good will, admiration, and thorough esteem, with which I am ever, my dear Roberts.

"Most truly yours,

"WORTLEY CLUTTERBUCK.

P. S. My letter is too long to revise, and the post is going. I forget whether or not I asked you the meaning of your last words, 'the forgery of a groundless fiction.' Now, as all forgery is fiction, and all fiction a kind of forgery, is not this tautological? The sentence would have ended more strongly with 'forgery,' only it hath an awful Bank-of-England sound, and would have ended like an indiction, besides sparing you several words, and conferring some meaning upon the remainder. But this is mere verbal criticism. Good bye—once more yours truly."

"P. S. 2d. Is it true that the Saints make up the losses of the review?—It is very handsome in them to be at so great an expense.—Pray pardon my taking up so much of your time from the bar, and from your clients, who I hear are about the same number with the readers of your journal. Twice more yours,

"W. C."

There was a philosopher that disputed with Demosthenes, the Emperor, and did it but weakly. Why, said the philosopher, would you have contented him that commands thirty legions?

There was one that found a great mass of money digged under ground in his grandfather's house, and being somewhat doubtful of the case, signified it to the emperor that he had found such treasure. VOLTAIRE.

Having stated that Bacon was frequently incorrect in his citations from history, I have thought it necessary in what regards so great a name (however trifling), to support the assertion by such facts as more immediately occur to me. They are but trifles, and yet for such trifles a schoolboy would be whipped (if still in the fourth form); and Voltaire for half a dozen similar errors has been treated as a superficial writer, nay, withstar Ping the testimony of the learned Warton—"Voltaire, a writer of much deeper research than is imagined, and the first who has displayed the literature and customs of the dark ages with any degree of penetration and comprehension." For another distinguished testimony to Voltaire's merits in literary research, see also Lord Holland's excellent Account of the Life and Writings of Lope de Vega, vol. i., p. 215, edition of 1817.

Voltaire has even been termed "a shallow fellow," by some of the same school who called Dryden's Ode "a drunken song;"—a school (as it is called, I presume, from their education being still incomplete) the whole of whose filthy trash of Epics, Excursions, a., a., &c., is not worth the two words in Zaire, "Voua plaisirs," or a single speech of Tancred.—a school, the apostate lives of whose renegades, with their tea-drinking neutrality of morals, and their convenient treachery in politics—in the record of their accumulated pretences to virtue can produce no actions (were all their good deeds drawn up in array) to equal or approach the sole defence of the family of Calas, by that great and unequalled genius—the universal Voltaire.

I have ventured to remark on these little inaccuracy of "the greatest genius that England or perhaps any other country ever produced," merely to show our national injustice in condemning generally, the greatest genius of France for such inadvertencies as these, of which the highest of England has been no less guilty. Query, was Bacon a great intellect than Newton?

TRANSLATION OF TWO EPISTLES FROM THE ARMENIAN VERSION.

THE EPISTLE OF THE CORINTHIANS TO ST. PAUL THE APOSTLE.*

1 Stephen, and the elders with him, Dabnus, Eubulus, Theophilus, and Xinon, to Paul, our father and evangelist, and faithful master in Jesus Christ, health.†
2 Two men have come to Corinth, Simon, by name, and Cleobus, who vehemently disturb the faith of some with deceitful and corrupt words;
3 Of which words thou shouldst inform thyself:
4 For neither have we heard such words from thee, nor from the other apostles:
5 But we know only that what we have heard from thee and from them, that we have kept firmly.
6 But in this chiefly has our Lord had compassion, that, whilst thou art yet with us in the flesh, we are again about to hear from thee.
7 Therefore do thou write to us, or come thyself among us quickly.
8 We believe in the Lord, that, as it was revealed to Theonas, he hath delivered thee from the hands of the unrighteous.†
9 But these are the sinful words of these impure men, for thus do they say and teach:
10 That it behooves not to admit the Prophets.‡
11 Neither do they affirm the omnipotence of God:
12 Neither do they affirm the resurrection of the flesh:
13 Neither do they affirm that man was altogether created by God:
14 Neither do they affirm that Jesus Christ was born in the flesh from the Virgin Mary:
15 Neither do they affirm that the world was the work of God, but of some one of the angels.
16 Therefore do thou make haste to come among us.
17 That this city of the Corinthians may remain without scandal.
18 And that the folly of these men may be made manifest by an open refutation. Fare thee well.††
19 The deacons Thereutus and Tichus††† received and conveyed this Epistle to the city of the Philippians.*

When Paul received the Epistle, although he was then in chains on account of Stratonice,† the wife of Apolohanus,† yet, as it were forgetting his bonds, he mourned over these words, and said, weeping, "It were better for me to be dead, and with the Lord. For while I am in this body, and hear the words of such false doctrine, behold, grief arises upon grief, and my trouble adds a weight to my chains; when I behold this calamity and progress of the machinations of Satan, who searcheth to do wrong."

And thus with deep affliction Paul composed his reply to the Epistle.‡‡

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS.¶

1 Paul, in bonds for Jesus Christ, disturbed by so many errors, to his Corinthian brethren, health.
2 I nothing marvel that the preachers of evil have made this progress.
3 For because the Lord Jesus is about to fulfill his coming, verily on this account do certain men perturb and despise his words.
4 But I, verily, from the beginning, have taught you that only which I myself received from the former apostles, who always remained with the Lord Jesus Christ.
5 And I now say unto you, that the Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, who was of the seed of David.
6 According to the annunciation of the Holy Ghost, sent to her by our Father from heaven;
7 That Jesus might be introduced into the world, and deliver our flesh by his flesh, and that he might raise us up from the dead:
8 As in this also he himself became the example:
9 That it might be made manifest that man was created by the Father.
10 He has not remained in perdition unsought,††
11 But he is sought for, that he might be revived by adoption.
12 For God, who is the Lord of all, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who made heaven and earth, sent firstly, the Prophets to the Jews: 13 That he would absolve them from their sins, and bring them to his judgment. 14 Because he wished to save, firstly, the house of Israel, he bestowed, and poured forth his Spirit upon the Prophets; 15 That they should for a long time preach the worship of God, and the nativity of Christ. 16 But he who was the prince of evil, when he wished to make himself God, laid his hand upon them, 17 And bound all men in sin,* 18 Because the judgment of the world was approaching. 19 But Almighty God, when he willed to justify, was unwilling to abandon his creature; 20 But when he saw his affliction, he had compassion upon him. 21 And at the end of a time he sent the Holy Ghost into the Virgin foretold by the Prophets. 22 Who, believing readily,† was made worthy to conceive, and bring forth our Lord Jesus Christ. 23 In a perishable body, in which the evil spirit was glorified, he should be cast out, and it should be made manifest 24 That he was not God: For Jesus Christ, in his flesh, had recalled and saved this perishable flesh, and drawn it into eternal life by faith, 25 Because in his body he would prepare a pure temple of justice for all ages; 26 In whom we also, when we believe, are saved. 27 Therefore know ye that these men are not the children of justice, but the children of wrath; 28 Who turn away from themselves the compasion of God; 29 Who say that neither the heavens nor the earth were altogether works made by the hand of the Father of all things.‡ 30 But these cursed men have the doctrine of the serpent. 31 But do ye, by the power of God, withdraw yourselves far from these, and expel from among you the doctrine of the wicked. 32 Because you are not the children of rebellion,§ but the sons of the belied church. 33 And on this account the time of the resurrection is preached to all men. 34 Therefore they who affirm that there is no resurrection of the flesh, they indeed shall not be raised up to eternal life; 35 But to judgment and condemnation shall the unbeliever arise in the flesh: 36 For to that body which denies the resurrection of the body, shall be denied the resurrection: because such are found to refuse the resurrection. 37 But you also, Corinthians! have known, from the seeds of wheat, and from other seeds, 38 That one grain falls † dry into the earth, and within it first dies. 39 And afterward rises again, by the will of the Lord, endued with the same body:

40 Neither indeed does it arise with the same simple body, but manifold, and filled with blessing. 41 But we produce the example not only from seeds, but from the honorable bodies of men.* 42 Ye also have known Jonas, the son of Amitai.† 43 Because he delayed to preach to the Ninevites he was swallowed up in the belly of a fish for three days and three nights: 44 And after three days, God heard his supplication, and brought him out from the deep abyss; 45 Neither was any part of his body corrupted; neither was his eyebrow bent down.‡ 46 And how much more for you, oh men of little faith! 47 If you believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, will he raise you up, even as he himself hath arisen. 48 If the bones of Elisha the prophet, falling upon the dead, revived the dead, 49 By how much more shall Jesus Christ revive you, on that day, with a perfect body, even as he himself hath arisen? 50 But if ye receive other things vainly,§ 51 Henceforth no one shall cause me to travail: for I bear on my body these fettors,|| 52 To obtain Christ; and I suffer with patience these afflictions to become worthy of the resurrection of the dead. 53 And do each of you, having received the law from the hands of the blessed Prophets and the holy gospel,‖ firmly maintain it; 54 To the end that you may be rewarded in the resurrection of the dead, and the possession of the life eternal. 55 But if any of ye, not believing, shall trespass, he shall be judged with the misdoers, and punished with those who have false belief. 56 Because such are the generations of vipers, and the children of dragons and basilisks. 57 Drive far from among ye, and fly from such, with the aid of our Lord Jesus Christ. 58 And the peace and grace of the beloved Son be upon you. Amen.

THE WILL OF LORD BYRON.

EXTRACTED FROM THE REGISTRY OF THE PREROGATIVE COURT OF CANTERBURY

This is the last will and testament of me, George Gordon, Lord Byron, Baron Byron, of Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster, as follows:—I give and devise all that my manor of lordship of Rochdale, in the said county of Lancaster, with all its rights, royalties, and hereditaments, and premises situate, lying, and being within the parish, manor, and lordship of Rochdale aforesaid, and all other my estates, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and premises whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my said Manors of Camberwell, Camby, and Hobhouse, late of Trinity College, Cambridge, Esquire, and John Hanson, of Chancery Lane, London, Esquire, to the use and behoof of them, their heirs, and assigns; and I direct the said John Cam Hobhouse and John Hanson, and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, do and shall, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, sell and dispose of all my said manor and estates for the most money that can or may be had or gotten for the same, either by private contract or public sale by auction, and either together or in lots, as my said trustees shall think proper, and for the facilitating such sales and sales, I do direct that the receipt and receipts of my said trustees, and the survivor of them, and the heirs and assigns of such survivor, shall be a good and sufficient discharge, and good and sufficient discharge to the purchaser or purchasers of my said estates, or any part or parts thereof, for so much money as is in such receipt or receipts shall be expressed or acknowledged to be received; and that such purchaser or purchasers, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, shall not afterward be in any manner answerable or accountable for such purchase-money, or be obliged to see to the application thereof; and I do will and direct that my said trustees shall stand possessed of the moneys to arise by the sale of my said estates upon such trusts and for such intents and purposes as I have hereinafter directed of and concerning the same: And whereas I have by certain deeds of conveyance made on my marriage with my present wife conveyed all my other manor and estate of Newstead, in the parishes of Newstead and Linley, in the county of Nottingham, unto my executors, upon trust to sell the same, and apply the sum of sixty thousand pounds, part of the money to arise by such sale, upon the trusts of my marriage settlement: Now I do hereby give and bequeath all the remainder of the purchase-money to arise by sale of my said estate at Newstead, and all the whole of the said sixty thousand pounds, or such part thereof as shall not become vested and payable under the trusts of my said marriage settlement, unto the said John Cam Hobhouse and John Hanson, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon such trusts and for such ends, intents, and purposes as hereinafter directed of and concern-witnessed appointment in the nature of a will, shall direct or appoint, and in default of any such appointment, or in case of the death of my said sister in my lifetime, then upon trust that they, my said trustees, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, do and shall assign and transfer all the trust, property and funds unto and among the children of my said sister, if more than one, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, and if only one such child, then to such only child the share and shares of such of them as shall be a son or sons, to be paid and transferred unto him and them when and as he or they shall respectively attain his or their age or ages of twenty-one years; and the share and shares of such of them as shall be a daughter or daughters, to be paid and transferred unto her or them when and as she or they shall respectively attain his or their age or ages of twenty-one years, or be married, which shall first happen, and in case any of such children shall happen to die, being a son or sons, before he or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married; then it is my will and I do direct that the share and shares of such of the said children as shall so die shall go to the survivor or survivors of such children, with the benefit of further accruer in case of the death of any such surviving children before their shares shall become vested. And I do direct that my said trustees shall pay and apply the interest and dividends of each of the said children's shares in the said trust funds for his, her, or their maintenance and education during their minorities, notwithstanding their shares may not become vested interests, but that such interest and dividends as shall not have been so applied shall accumulate, and follow, and go over with the principal. And I do nominate, constitute, and appoint the said John Cam Hobhouse and John Hanson executors of this my will. And I do will and direct that my said trustees shall not be answerable the one of them for the other of them, or for the acts, deeds, receipts, or defaults of the other of them, but each of them for his own acts, deeds, receipts, and wilful defaults only, and that they my said trustees shall be entitled to retain and deduct out of the moneys which shall come to their hands under the trusts aforesaid all such costs, charges, damages, and expenses which they or any of them shall bear, pay, sustain, or be put unto, in the execution and performance of the trusts herein reposed in them. I make the above provision for my sister and her children, in conse-cquence of my dear wife Lady Byron and any children I may have, being otherwise amply provided for; and, lastly, I do revoke all former wills by me at any time heretofore made, and do declare this only to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof, I have to this my last will, contained in three sheets thereof, and to this third and last sheet my hand and seal this 29th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1815.

BYRON, [L.S.]

Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the said Lord Byron, the testator, as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, at his request, in his presence, and in the presence of each other, have hereto subscribed our names as witnesses.

CODICIL.—This is a Codicil to the last will and testament of me, the Right Honorable George Gordon, Lord Byron. I give and bequeath unto Allegra Byron, an infant of about two months old, by me brought up, and now residing at Venice, the sum of five thousand pounds, which I direct the executors of my said will to pay to her on her attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the day of her marriage, on condition that she does not marry with a native of Great Britain, which shall first happen. And I direct my said executors, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, to invest the said sum of five thousand pounds, upon government or real security, and to pay and apply the annual income thereof in or towards the main tenance and education of the said Allegra Byron until she attains her said age of twenty-one years or shall be married as aforesaid; but in case she shall die before attaining the said age and without having been married, then I direct the said sum of five thousand pounds to become part of the residue of my personal estate, and in all other respects I do confirm my said will, and declare this to be a codicil thereto. In witness whereof, I have here-unto set my hand and seal, at Venice, this 17th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1818.

BYRON, [L.S.]

Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the said Lord Byron, as and for a codicil to his will, in the presence of us, who, in his presence, at his request, and in the presence of each other, have subscribed our names as witnesses.

NEWTON HANSON,
WILLIAM FLETCHER.

Proved at London, (with a codicil,) 6th of July, 1824, before the Worshipful Stephen Lushington, Doctor of Laws, and surrogate, by the oaths of John Cam Hobhouse and John Hanson. Requires the executors to whom administration was granted having been first sworn duly to administer.
